Probe urged of UNIFIL

Peacekeepers allegedly assisted Hezbollah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Geneva-based human rights organization is calling on the the United Nations to investigate allegations that United Nations forces in Lebanon provided online descriptions of Israeli troop movements that aided Hezbollah during the recent conflict.

UN Watch, a non-governmental organization founded in 1993 to monitor UN compliance with its charter, said an investigation is necessary to determine whether the allegations of United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) collusion with Hezbollah are true.

In a letter to Secretary General Kofi Annan, UN Watch said evidence presented in a Weekly Standard magazine article suggests UNIFIL "assisted Hezbollah terrorists by publishing detailed, sensitive information on Israeli troop movements on its website during the recent Israel/Hezbollah conflict… No similar information was published about Hezbollah forces, who fired more than 4,000 missiles aimed deliberately at Israeli civilians.

"If true, such conduct is unconscionable… and raises troubling questions as to whether UN forces can be trusted to even-handedly police this area, just as more are being readied to deploy."

The News in Brief

Suspect in Ross Killing

TORONTO — Daniel Sylvester, the alleged killer of Alicia Ross, must face trial on a charge of second-degree murder, Judge Peter Tetley ruled last week in a Newmarket court. Ross disappeared from her family home in Markham on Aug. 16, 2005. Her remains were found about five weeks later after Sylvester, her 32-year-old neighbour, surrendered to police and led them to the two locations where the remains were hidden. Lawyers for the Crown and for Sylvester say the case could go to trial early next year. Sylvester faces a maximum of life imprisonment with no chance of parole for 10 to 25 years.

WORLD

Teaching Hate

NEW YORK — Iranian schools teach hatred of Christians, Jews and the West, according to a new study. The analysis by researchers with the Center for Monitoring Peace in the Middle East found examples of anti-western hatred and anti-Semitism in many of 115 textbooks used in Iran in grades 1 to 12. In one Grade 3 textbook, inhabitants of a clean town chase away a repugnant figure wearing a Star of David.

Peace Pole

PRAGUE — A Japanese peace group erected a monument at the former Theresienstadt transit camp. A giant peace pole with the inscription, "May Peace Prevail on Earth," in Czech, Japanese, German and English was dedicated last weel at the camp, now a museum in the Czech Republic, by members of the Japanese branch of the World Peace Prayer Society. The Japanese said they had chosen Terezin, as the camp is called in Czech, because it is a symbol of wartime suffering.

Israel Favoured

WASHINGTON — Americans who believe God gave Israel to the Jewish people are much likelier to sympathize with the Jewish state, a survey found. Of respondents who said they believe Israel was a divine birthright for the Jews, 63 per cent said they sympathize more with Israel than the Palestinians, and just four per cent sympathize more with the Palestinians, a Pew Forum survey found. The survey of 2,003 adults was taken in July and has a margin of error of between 2.5 and 3.5 percentage points.

Torah Dedicated

WASHINGTON — A New Orleans synagogue that lost its Torah scrolls to flooding dedicated a new scroll for the anniversary of Hurricane Katrina last week. On Sunday, Congregation Beth Israel dedicated a scroll donated by the Los Angeles Jewish community, at its temporary quarters. Seven ruined Torah scrolls were recovered and buried after last year's flood. National Council of Young Israel, the Orthodox umbrella body, facilitated the dedication.

Mason Sues Jews for Jesus

NEW YORK — Jackie Mason is suing Jews for Jesus for using his name and likeness in a pamphlet. The pamphlets, which the missionary group has been distributing around New York City, feature the comedian's image juxtaposed with the words "Jackie Mason A Jew for Jesus!?"

Jackie Mason

"While I have the utmost respect for people who practise the Christian faith, the fact is, as everyone knows, I am as Jewish as a matzah ball or kosher salami," the 75-year-old said in documents filed in state Supreme Court in Manhattan, according to the Associated Press.

A Jews for Jesus official chided Mason for getting so upset.

Bomb Use Checked

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department is reportedly investigating whether Israel's use of American-made cluster bombs in southern Lebanon violated agreements with the United States. The investigation began after reports that three types of American cluster munitions, were found in many areas of southern Lebanon and were responsible for civilian casualties, the New York Times reported. The inquiry is not expected to lead to sanctions.

Suspended Sentence

PRAGUE — A man who attacked Poland's chief rabbi in May received a suspended sentence. Karol G., 33, was convicted by a Warsaw court of an act of violence and racially motivated hate speech for assaulting Rabbi Michael Schudrich.

Chabad Emissary

NEW YORK — Chabad-Lubavitch now has a representative in Laos. Rabbi Shalom Ber Marzel and his wife are expected to serve Israeli backpackers and other tourists who visit the Southeast Asian country by providing kosher food and Shabbat meals. Laos is the 73rd country to have a Chabad emissary. Seed funding for the new office comes from the Rohr Family Foundation.

CJC instrumental in return of Nazi-looted art

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The recent decision by the National Gallery of Canada to return a century-old French painting looted by the Nazis to its rightful Jewish owners is also a victory for the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Edouard Vuillard self-portrait

Last month, it returned Edouard Vuillard's Le Salon de Madame Aron to the heirs of Paris art dealer Jacques Lindon, whose father, Alfred, originally owned it.

Described as "a quintessential Vuillard" by National Gallery of Canada curator Michael Pantazzi, the 55-by 62-centimetre work was stolen from a bank vault by the Nazis.

Congress had pressed for its return, said Eric Vernon, Congress' Ottawa-based director of government relations.

"We have been active on this file for a number of years," he said.

Congress representatives attended the Washington conference on Holocaust era assets in 1998 and persuaded Canada to send officials to the International Forum on Holocaust-Era Looted Cultural Assets, held in Vilnius, Lithuania, in October 2000.

A year later, Congress and the Canadian Museum Association jointly sponsored a symposium in Ottawa on Holocaust-era cultural property hosted by the National Gallery of Canada.

"We were urging Canadian galleries to check their inventory for works with questionable provenance or gaps in their ownership and to publicize these on the Internet or their websites," he added. "This is what led to the Vuillard painting eventually being returned to their rightful owners."

In 2000, after the Canadian Museum Directors Association established guidelines on illegally acquired objects during the Nazi period, the National Gallery of Canada examined the provenance of part of its collection.

Subsequently, the National Gallery of Canada officially announced its intention to return the Vuillard oil on canvas to the Lindons.

Lindon twice refused to accept it, saying it had never belonged to him or his family.

But German wartime documents unearthed by the French government confirmed that the Lindons were, in fact, the proprietors.

As a result, the Lindons – who are well-known patrons of the arts – and the National Gallery of Canada reached an agreement on the ownership of the painting, and it was transferred to them in New York in mid-August.

Commending the National Gallery of Canada for its integrity, Vernon urged other Canadian institutions to comb their collections for suspect works.

Le Salon de Madame Aron* by Edouard Vuillard

"I believe that many other galleries and museums in Canada now have undergone a similar process regarding the possibility of cultural property in their possession being Nazi looted art," he said.

UNIFIL, UNISHAME

From the editor's desk

Shimon Peres' expression says it all. It seems to capture what most supporters of Israel have been thinking about UN Secretary General Kofi Annan and the United Nations for the past many weeks, if not for the past many years.

Peres appears incredulous, stopped in his tracks by something Annan is saying.

We can't be sure of what Annan said. Perhaps he was pleading with Peres that Israel stop humiliating Lebanon. Apparently, the "humiliation" of Lebanon by Israel was a major theme of the secretary general's remarks to Israeli leaders last week.

"I think it is time for the siege [Israel's air and sea blockade of Lebanon's borders] to be lifted," Annan offered. According to the Israeli media, Annan made the point that the ongoing blockade of Lebanon was hurting the Lebanese government and weakening the democratically elected government there.

"The Lebanese have shown they're serious about the implementation [of the ceasefire agreement], in all the deployment and efforts they have made."

And this is why Peres seems to be incredulous. The concern has never been whether the Lebanese were serious about implementing the ceasefire. The concern has always been whether Hezbollah was serious about implementing the ceasefire.

Of course it is not.

Since the very first moments the ceasefire went into effect, there have been frequent efforts by Hezbollah's sinister sponsors – Iran and Syria – to smuggle weapons back into the south Lebanese enclave. Indeed, according to certain security sources, some of those efforts, on the backs of mules and other pack animals through the hilly and rugged terrain of eastern Lebanon that borders Syria, have been successful. Annan was in Israel last week after a short visit in south Lebanon. His press attaché billed the secretary general's trip to the region as a mission to shore up the ceasefire.

In Israel he met with Defence Minister Amir Peretz, Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

According to reports in Israel, Olmert and Annan met for some 90 minutes, of which 20 minutes were in private. Rumours immediately circulated that Annan's private session with Olmert was to discuss the secretary general's idea of a confidence-building gesture by Israel to Iran. Aides to Olmert described the atmosphere as "friendly" and "warm." Whether it was productive will be measured by results in the field over the coming days. Annan was also scheduled to visit Iran, Syria, Egypt and Jordan during this Mideast tour.

Shimon Peres and Kofi Annan

When asked at a press conference in Israel why he was so determined to visit Iran to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran even though Ahmadinejad has called repeatedly for the destruction of Israel and has obsessively derided and denied the Holocaust, Annan was staunchly adamant in response.

"I am aware of what the president of Iran has said and, as I have indicated in the past, Israel is a member of the UN, a recognized member state and has the right to exist," he said. "One cannot wipe away Israel with a statement. Those types of statements should not be made".

Herein lies Annan's key problem. He is utterly bereft of any credibility. What steps has he taken to reprimand, let alone punish Ahmadinejad for his genocidal aspirations regarding Israel? This is not a case of a territorial dispute between member states who acknowledge, even if bitterly, each other's sovereign existence. This is a case in which one member state – Iran – by its repeated calling for the destruction of another member state, is in constant and continual violation of the UN charter, which it is Annan's foremost duty to uphold.

As reported in this issue of The CJN, the secretary general's office has denied allegations by UN Watch, a non-governmental organization based in Geneva, that the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) forces may have aided Hezbollah in last month's war.

Annan's spokesperson in New York, Stephane Dujarric, flatly denied the allegations. He added that "UNIFIL consistently reported on the presence of Hezbollah fighters whenever those fighters were positioned near UNIFIL positions."

But the photo on Page 1 of The CJN last week makes a mockery of Dujarric's statement. The UNIFIL post was merely metres from the two-kilometre-square underground Hezbollah bunker.

How is it possible that the long, labour-intensive efforts of digging out, reinforcing, equipping, furnishing and manning so gargantuan a bunker was carried out under UNIFIL noses without anyone in that United Nations post noticing? And if they did notice, to whom did they report what they saw? And what, if any action was done about it?

The gap between what UN officials say and what they do is too wide and too deep for the organization and its leader to have any credibility. And that singular dissonance between truth and reality is both a pity for the world and a shame on the United Nations.

Educators 'need to do something' about the Holocaust

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

First annual summer symposium presented by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem

Teachers don't need to devote a three-week chunk of time to the Holocaust in order to address the subject in their classrooms, according to two teachers who conducted a workshop last week at the first annual summer Holocaust symposium presented by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

More than 100 people, including about 60 teachers from Catholic and public schools in Toronto and surrounding areas, attended the two-day program, titled "Teaching the Holocaust: Now More Than Ever," at Marshall McLuhan Catholic Secondary School, said Goldi Steiner, chair of the organization's continuing Holocaust education committee.

Lisa Johnston, who teaches at a Catholic high school in St. Thomas, Ont., said at the workshop that some teachers don't know where to begin when it comes to teaching the Holocaust. "The message we've heard is that you need to do something."

"It may be four days here, two days there, or talking about [the Holocaust] as an example," said Mary Bechberger, who conducted the workshop with Johnston and who teaches at the same school.

Johnston told the group, "Don't just rely on history teachers to teach the Holocaust." Subjects like English, drama and art also lend themselves to Holocaust education, she said.

She and Bechberger made a presentation to the entire staff at their school on their return from Israel, where they attended the summer program at Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies (ISHS). "It's essential to collaborate on this topic," Johnston said.

Johnston and Bechberger, both of whom are entering their fifth year of teaching, have also attended a one-week summer course at the General Romeo Dallaire Institute for Genocide Studies in London, Ont.

Johnston said she introduced the Holocaust and genocidal studies into her Grade 10 civics class "to encourage responsible citizenship."

She recommended using selected film clips for their impact when time is limited, and Bechberger cautioned participants to use such material responsibly, familiarizing themselves with the content ahead of time and providing necessary context.

Johnston also recommended having Holocaust survivors visit the classroom "if at all possible."

Participant Barbara Lazar, who teaches immigrant students, noted that many of the children she works with came to Canada as refugees. For them to hear stories from survivors who have learned a new language and built a new life here has been "a blessing" and has given her students "a real sense of calm."

Bechberger likes to talk about resistance, whether overt or more subtle, such as practising one's faith in secret. "If we can give the kids some kind of hope that there were people who stood up and there are people today who stand up, it empowers them."

She has also found it helpful to "try and rescue individual stories" by introducing students to "a face and a name" to create empathy.

"It's important to emphasize that Jews were not different from us. They had lives, families, hobbies. They had a religious life. Many of [the children] had toys and activities just like kids today."

Addressing Christian anti-Semitism in a Catholic school is also important, she said. "This can be a tough topic… [but] if we're going to be honest, we have to examine things that were done in the name of the Christian faith.

"If you do it well, you could also emphasize that relations have improved. Things are happening today that improve Christian-Jewish relations."

Another point made was the importance of relating the Holocaust to contemporary issues, including hate crimes and modern anti-Semitism.

Bechberger said she used to focus just on World War II and Holocaust victims, but now she feels it's "important to give students an understanding of the context of the story," including information about the lives of Jews before and after the war, as well as discussion about perpetrators, bystanders and rescuers.

"I try to avoid generalizations [such as] all perpetrators were uneducated or all Jews did [x]. The Holocaust is very complicated."

Keynote speakers at the program last week were Ephraim Kaye and Stephanie McMahon-Kaye, ISHS director and co-ordinator respectively. Kaye's topic was "Holocaust Denial and Contemporary Anti-Semitism" and McMahon-Kaye addressed "Righteous Among the Nations."

Na'amat concert raises money for Israeli victims

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Na'amat Canada Toronto's emergency benefit concert to raise funds for Israeli victims of war was pulled together in just two weeks says Lorraine Levene, the organization's executive director.

"We began planning on Aug. 2 for the Aug. 16 concert, [held at Beth David B'nai Israel Synagogue] and within five days our president Orit Nusbaum had all the stars lined up. Not one person said no," she said.

Headlining at the the concert, attended by almost 600 people – the organization raised more than $40,000 – were singer Amy Sky, comedian Avi Hoffman, the Halleluja Drummers, the Toronto Jewish Male Choir and Kobi Chai with Eric Ifrah on the keyboard.

"Everyone was behind the cause, and many donated their services. It was just amazing," said Levene.

Money raised, she said, helped resettle children who were evacuated from Na'amat's day-care centres in the north.

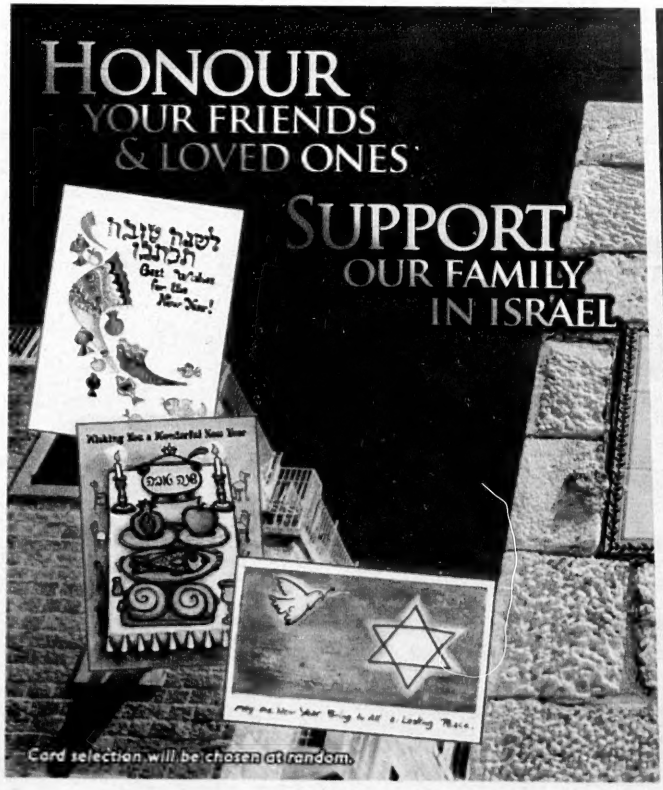
The organization operates more than 60 per cent of the country's day cares, she said, and due to the conflict, they were forced to evacuate the children to other Na'amat facilities.

"They're now in the midst of going back, but we still need funds to repair the damage that was done by the Katyusha missiles.

"The government is repairing building structures, but they're not replacing whatever was damaged within our centres. That is up to us. [The money we've raised] is a drop in the bucket," she said.

The children – many come from poor families – "were traumatized from being locked up in stuffy shelters, and although they're moving back now, we still have to help them get through it."

She said she's "moved" by the tremendous response of Na'amat members and the community. "Even CBC came and put us on [television]. Everyone came through above and beyond."



At this time of year, Jews around the world gather to celebrate Rosh Hashanah, a time for new beginnings, but also a time to reflect on past events and to recall the hardships that have occurred.

As Israel faces some of the toughest times in her short history, consider sending a Rosh Hashanah greeting card to your loved ones, which will benefit over one million Israelis who have been severely affected by devastating Hezbollah rocket attacks. What better way to honour family and friends than by making a contribution to UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, which will relieve the anguish of so many Israelis in distress.

Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 is our regular annual campaign, with special emphasis on Israel's emergency situation. The campaign is committed to raising an additional $20 million for Israel on top of our regular annual campaign total. With your help, we will provide desperately needed Israeli social services and, at the same time, maintain our vital support for local needs here at home.

Let's mark this Rosh Hashanah as a time of hope and let's express strong support for Jews everywhere.

The soldiers must be freed

The frustration is untenable. The anger and rage unbearable. Thus, tens of thousands of Israelis gathered last week in Tel Aviv's central square to decry the cruel, criminal captivity of Gilad Shalit, Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser. They called upon the world's leaders to help secure the release of the three kidnapped Israelis.

Shalit was kidnapped by Hamas on June 25; Regev and Goldwasser were kidnapped by Hezbollah on July 12. They have remained in captivity ever since, and the world has exploded; so, too, have the lives of their families.

Ehud Goldwasser

When he was in Israel last week, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan met with the three families. It was a gesture of goodwill rather than of substance, for he could provide the entreating families no information about their loved ones' conditions. Nor could he outline any steps he would take to effect the captives' release. But, refusing to surrender to the stark implications of the secretary general's helplessness, the families found what sliver of fading hope they could.

Eldad Regev

Karnit Goldwasser, Ehud's wife, said,"We got a personal pledge from the secretary general that he accepts the mission to get the three kidnapped soldiers home, and that's a really big thing."

Gilad Shalit

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Dan Gillerman, who also attended the meeting, expressed the wish that the secretary general "[would] leave here with a real feeling of obligation, of a moral mission to do everything he can – and he is going to several capitals in which there is influence on this matter – to bring about Udi [Ehud], Eldad and Gilad's speedy return home."

UN Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the current round of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah, requires that the security council "address urgently… the unconditional release of the abducted Israeli soldiers."

It falls upon all of us to ensure that, when he visits those capitals in which there is influence and afterward as well, the secretary general honour both his duty under Resolution 1701 and his pledge to the soldiers' families.

The rally in Tel Aviv was a vociferous, defiant shouting of moral support by scores of thousands of anguished Israelis for the captives' families. We must add our voices to theirs. They must not be the only ones shouting. Nor must the families feel alone.

True to their sadistic, brutal natures, Hezbollah and Hamas have refused the International Red Cross permission to inspect the condition of the captives. Did we expect anything less?

The anti-Zionist Neturei Karta joined forces with Israeli chief rabbis Ovadia Yosef and Shlomo Goren and leaders of the National Religious Party and Agudat Israel to protest archeological excavations outside the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem. The dispute threatened the status quo agreement between the religious and secular communities reached at independence.

Toronto's Orthodox community

While we want the haredim to be more tolerant of us, we are not tolerant of them ("Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right wing?" CJN, Aug. 24 and 31).

Rabbi Shlomo Miller has a right to say his opinion to anyone who wants to accept his views. However, I am not sure who in this community Rabbi Jay Kelman and Joseph Fried are taking their positions from. Clearly they are nowhere near as learned as Rabbi Miller, and I am not sure which rabbi is leading modern Orthodoxy in Canada. If no rabbi wants to take a position against Rabbi Miller, maybe from a straight halachic position, there is no other position to take.

As far as Rabbi Gedalia Felder and his tolerance in the past goes, we must remember that at that time there were many people who had to work on Shabbos and Rabbi Felder only took on the battles he felt he could win. His son is carrying on his work and his shul is tolerant of many views of Torah Judaism, whether they are Hassidish, Mizrachi or Yeshivish.

It is indeed heartening to know that in Toronto this summer the issues of bugs in lettuce and the number of days of Creation, have gripped the Orthodox community. The Jewish poor and elderly in Toronto can fend for themselves – the Orthodox are too busy debating the number of angels on the head of a pin.

Let assimilation and intermarriage run rampant in Toronto. The haredim are too busy building walls and fences around Bathurst and Lawrence to notice. And the modern Orthodox are too busy looking over their shoulders at the haredim to reach out to their Jewish brothers and sisters.

Hello from Israel! We had a war this summer. The Jewish state survived but remains imperilled. Religious, secular, halachic, non-halachic – we were all in it together and in the process experienced achdut, that is true Jewish unity. Like many parents in Israel, we spent a month of sleepless nights until our son returned from the war.

There is a world outside of the Bathurst Street corridor. I would suggest that if Toronto Orthodox Jewry aspires to be a model for others and a vehicle for Jewish survival, it should lift its collective head out of the sand, take a deep breath and get to work on the things that really matter in this world.

Your article raised some valid questions about the strength of modern Orthodoxy in Toronto. But as I read through the article I could not help wondering about the strength of Toronto's haredi Orthodoxy. The absurd attacks of haredi spokesmen on a fine, devout scholar like Rabbi Natan Slifkin hardly seem to be a sign of haredi triumph or even triumphalism. They are perhaps better understood as the desperate and fearful actions of people who realize on some level that their time has passed.

Holocaust education not embraced

A few lectures given at Cluj-Napoca University or at Babes-Bolyai University do not warrant the claim that "Romania is embracing Holocaust education" (CJN, Aug. 10).

Laurence Weinbaum, in a dissertation in the June edition of Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs Post-Holocaust and Anti-Semitism publication, writes that "[it] is the Foreign Ministry under Mihai-Razvan Ungureanu that has been most active in heightening awareness of Romania's role in the Holocaust. The question, however, is whether this new stance is mainly for foreign consumption."

Radu Ioanid, a historian, director of the International Archival Program Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies at the U.S. Washington Holocaust Museum, wrote in an article for the Wall Street Journal (Europe) on May 30 that "the boundaries between extreme and mainstream parties are more fluid in Romania than in other countries in the region. And although Holocaust denial is a crime, no Holocaust denier has ever been punished in Romania."

Ioanid also refers to the fact that the Romanian President Traian Basescu has received and publicly socialized with "Corneliu Vadim Tudor, a megalomaniac demagogue whose political program boils down to vicious hatred toward Hungarians, Jews and Roma."

This is the Romania of today. Teaching the Holocaust consists of occasional lectures attended on a voluntary basis at a small number of universities. Despite Romania's significant involvement in this historic tragedy, education of the Holocaust has been overlooked as a compulsory component of the Romanian secondary school curriculum.

Knowing the fickle temperament and character of Romanian leaders, I would not bet on Romania's embracing Holocaust education.

Academics against Israel

The following is Part 1 of a two-part article.

By MANFRED GERSTENFELD

What do Concordia University in Montreal, San Francisco State University, University of California at Irvine, Columbia University, the School of Oriental and African Studies at the University of London, the British teachers unions – the Association of University Teachers (AUT) and the University and National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE) – and MAUP University in Kiev all have in common? In the past few years, they have become prime names associated with aggression and discrimination against Israel, Israelis and/or Jews. Many other academic institutions in several countries could be added to this list.

More candidates are likely to emerge when the new academic year starts. The combined forces of radical Islam and the extreme left on campus will whitewash Hezbollah and other genocidal Muslim forces, and at the same time, present Israelis as war criminals.

In recent years, some acts of aggression have received more media attention than others. Among them were a number of attempts to boycott or discriminate against Israel and Israeli academics. Many originated in Great Britain. Divestment petitions were a frequent approach in the United States. The array of hostile acts also included violence of various kinds, anti-Israeli propaganda presented as academic scholarship and censorship of facts concerning Muslim anti-Semitism, as recently happened at Utrecht University in the Netherlands.

The boycott issue was the initial tool of anti-Israeli behaviour used by academics in the new century. In April 2002, two British professors, Steven Rose, who is Jewish, and his wife, Hilary, initiated an international boycott campaign against Israel. They stated that Israeli academics were the only scholars from non-member countries eligible for grants from the European Union. They claimed that in view of Israel's attitudes toward the Palestinians, these should be suspended.

On April 6, 2002, they, along with their associates, published an open letter in the often anti-Israeli daily, the Guardian. It called for a moratorium on all cultural and research links with Israel at European or national levels until the Israeli government "abides" by UN resolutions and opens "serious peace negotiations with the Palestinians, along the lines proposed in many peace plans, including that most recently sponsored by the Saudis and the Arab League."

Within a few weeks, the Roses, who had been involved in left-wing causes for decades, collected several hundred signatures for their petition. They received international publicity for their attacks on Israel, something they had not achieved in their academic work.

A few months later, another case in the United Kingdom attracted attention. Mona Baker, an Egyptian-born professor of translation studies, at University of Manchester Institute of Science and Technology (UMIST), now part of the University in Manchester, sacked two Israeli academics, Miriam Shlesinger and Prof. Gideon Toury, from the editorial boards of academic journals Baker and her husband own and edit. UMIST held an enquiry that found Baker innocent because her journals were not under the University's auspices.

This ruling was seen as a victory for the anti-Israel forces.

In October, Prime Minister Tony Blair told U.K. Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks he would do anything necessary to stop academic boycott attempts of Israel.

This anti-Israel discrimination issue then developed in many directions. There were efforts to prevent Israeli academics from obtaining grants. Academic institutions were asked to sever relations with Israeli universities and scholars, academics were convinced not to visit Israel, attempts were made to prevent the publication of articles by Israeli scholars, people were encouraged to refuse to review the work of Israeli academics and not to give students who want to study in Israel a recommendation or not allow them credits for their work there. In addition, there were unofficial or concealed boycotts, as when foreign academics severed relations with Israelis with whom they had had contact for many years.

Despite the length of this list, the impact of the anti-Israel actions was minor. In 2002, of about 7,000 research papers sent out by Israeli universities for foreign reference, only 25 scholars approached refused to deal with them.

In June 2003, the British boycott campaigners suffered a major defeat. Andrew Wilkie, a professor of pathology at Oxford University, sent an e-mail reply to an Israeli student, Amit Duvshani, who had contacted him for a research position. Wilkie wrote that in no way would he take on somebody who had served in the Israeli army. A few days later, a British Jewish academic, Ronnie Fraser, brought the matter to the attention of the Sunday Telegraph.

When the paper contacted Oxford University, its administration reacted swiftly to avoid accusations of racism. Before the article was published, the university started an investigation of Wilkie. On the same day, he apologized for his e-mail but not for holding his opinions.

In October 2003, Oxford University suspended Wilkie for two months without pay, the most serious penalty short of dismissal that the university could impose.

Thus, one phone call to a newspaper had transformed Wilkie within a few days from an accuser into the accused. Whatever Wilkie's academic achievements may be, he is going to be remembered, if at all, for his racist act toward an Israeli student.

Outside of Britain, there were also some boycott attempts that did not go very far. In France, there was initial success at a few universities. At the end of 2002, the board of Paris 6 University, also known as Jussieu, adopted a petition expressing its opposition to the renewal of the association agreement between the European Union and Israel.

Jewish philosopher Bernard-Henri Lévy, commented: "The French university is the only major institution which has not repented its mistakes under the Vichy regime. In this context the boycott [of Israeli universities] by Paris 6 seems even more shameful." Under major government and public pressure, the university reversed its decision.

An anti-Israel rally at Concordia University in Montreal in 2002, that became violent and prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking at the school.

In the United Kingdom, however, boycott attempts have continued and may come up again after the new academic year starts. The two major unions of academic teachers, AUT and NATFHE, have merged into the University and College Union (UCU). In both, there were boycott resolutions, which, however, came under severe national and international attack; and they were reversed or annulled by the merger. In addition, they may have represented breaches of British equality law.

Divestment petitions were another major attempt at organized anti-Israeli action. These were mainly centred in the United States, as universities there often have endowment funds that invest in securities. In 2002, petitions for divestment were circulated at more than 50 American campuses.

Within the University of California system, more than 7,000 students and faculty members signed documents in support of divestment that year. Yet, over the past four years, not a single campus authority has taken a decision to divest itself of Israeli or Israel-related securities. Many university presidents condemned the proposals.

The divestment movement has, however, at least verbally, had some success outside the academic world among some American and Canadian churches and a few trade unions in Canada and South Africa.

Presenting anti-Israel propaganda as teaching is another type of distortion on campus. The field of Middle Eastern studies in the United States has become a focal point for this. Though the phenomenon is widespread, public attention mainly focused on MEALAC, Columbia University's Middle Eastern languages department.

A non-university grassroots organization called the David Project exposed dozens of cases of faculty misbehaviour in a documentary called Columbia Unbecoming, which was released in October 2004. The adverse publicity forced Columbia's administration to undertake an enquiry, but the investigation was heavily flawed. More was hidden than admitted. Yet, the Columbia administration could not conceal that it had failed in handling student grievances.

Middle East scholar Martin Kramer had published a book in 2001, Ivory Towers on Sand, dealing with the failure of Middle Eastern studies in the United States. It stated that for the past 20 years, Middle Eastern studies had been factories of error. Kramer concluded that Middle Eastern studies were unsuccessful at a time when understanding the Middle East had become crucial to the United States.

In particular, Palestinian studies at American universities are a largely superfluous field, because of the bias of many academics teaching there. The main originality of Palestinian society is in developing new methods of terrorism, a subject rarely studied in Palestinian studies programs, but usually dealt with by terrorism scholars. There are many other anti-Israeli and anti-Semitic actions on campuses, primarily of a local nature. Some, as before mentioned, have become notorious.

Attacks on Jews and Israel are usually an indication of deeper problems in societies or segments of them. This is equally true for the academic world. The problems Jews and Israelis encounter on many campuses are far more serious than scholars' attitudes toward the Palestinian problem. Some issues at stake concern the nature of academia, the meaning and limitations of academic freedom, and frequent attempts, especially in the social and political sciences, to substitute propaganda for scholarship in multiple areas unrelated to Jewish or Israeli matters. The coming academic year is likely to provide many additional insights into these problems.

Manfred Gerstenfeld is chair of the board of fellows of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. He is preparing a book on academics against Israel.

Weddings during wartime

There is a time for everything. Even emotions must follow an etiquette of proper timing. As Ecclesiastes says: "There is a time to weep and a time to laugh, a time to mourn and a time to dance."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

This summer, I had a full slate of weddings at the same time as the war in Israel was going on. At times, I'd enter a celebration right after hearing bad news on the radio. I wondered whether this was the right time to rejoice.

It's insensitive to ignore communal suffering. Jewish tradition obligates everyone to reduce frivolous activities during a time of crisis. (One view even requires couples to diminish marital relations.) This tradition added to my difficulty: how can we celebrate when Israel is suffering?

The Jewish calendar offers a solution to this dilemma. In talmudic times, a singles holiday was held on Tu b'Av, the 15th day of Av. Young men and women would gather in celebration to find a match. It was a joyous holiday.

However, the Tu b'Av tradition is strange. Just six days earlier is the ninth of Av, the day we mourn the destruction of the two Temples. Isn't it deeply inappropriate to have a singles' holiday right after a day of mourning?

The answer is that joy serves many functions. Joy can be a diversion, a frivolous distraction. In times of tragedy, such a celebration is insensitive because it ignores the suffering of others. However, joy is also a genuine response to tragedy.

After a tragedy, we can remain frozen, unable to continue. Unfortunately, by refusing to live life to the fullest, we will have allowed the tragedy to claim another victim, and thus enlarged the scope of destruction. Mourning can collaborate with death, allowing death to overtake the living. In these moments, one must celebrate to assert that life goes on.

Tu b'Av teaches us that a good wedding is a genuine response to tragedy. The Talmud says that when a bride and groom rejoice, it is as if a section of Jerusalem has been rebuilt. By marrying, the young couple have reversed the tide of tragedy and taken a step on the road to redemption.

In the first week of the war, Shlomi Boskila and Maya Lugasi got married in northern Israel. Because of Katyusha attacks, they couldn't use the hall they had booked, so they got married in a bomb shelter. Their new venue may have been cramped and the crowd small, yet their wedding made a huge statement.

As Boskila put it: "This shows… that not even 20,000 missiles can destroy the happiness of the bride and groom."

In times of tragedy, a wedding like this, which expresses courage and affirms life, is exactly what is needed.

There is a time for everything. Sometimes, wartime is the right time for a wedding, too.

The missing pieces

War is hell, particularly for children. Even now, amid a Mideast ceasefire, parents caught in the crossfire remain on the front lines with their children. What information to share, how to explain the adult world's chaos, opens educational, psychological and moral dilemmas.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Spending this summer in Jerusalem, our four children experienced no trauma, enjoying themselves, although the war fascinated them. Our four-year-old asked, "Why do the Palestinians keep bombing Israel?"

Overlooking Hezbollah's popularity in Gaza, hoping the next generation will bring peace, my wife and I explained that Hezbollah Shi'ites are not Palestinians and not all Palestinians embrace terror. Recognizing our attempts to avoid stereotyping, our nine-year-old asked the more nuanced, devastating question, which Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora must answer: "How come the mean Arabs push the good Arabs around?"

While some Israeli friends banish their children when the TV stations broadcast bad news, we do not shelter our kids from unpleasant realities. True, we omitted to mention the Palestinian sporting a five-kilogram suicide bomb vest caught two blocks away from us. But our kids knew that, despite our comfort, others nearby suffered.

Our six-year-old, who made Hamas and Hezbollah the bad guys in his imaginary games, told visitors, "Hezbollah won't bomb us [in downtown Jerusalem] because we're too close to the Dome of the Rock, and if they hit that, the other Arabs would get mad."

When we told our 11-year-old daughter before she left for sleepaway music camp that she might end up in a bomb shelter – she didn't – she asked, logically, "How do you get oxygen in underground shelters?"

Giving the children some sense of control – while teaching social responsibility – we joined Israel's massive outreach initiative to support soldiers and terrorized civilians. My two sons and I visited Sderot, the working class immigrant town Hamas bombs regularly from Gaza. We went mid-morning, when Kassam missiles rarely fall, visiting a family whose house these "crude," "primitive" yet dangerous rockets damaged. We embraced them with flowers and hugs. Amid the commotion, only the head of the household knew some monetary assistance was subtly delivered too.

South of Sderot, we met Rabbi Seth Mandell and the staff of Camp Koby, reluctant masters at coping with trauma. Palestinian terrorists murdered Rabbi Mandell's son Koby in 2001. Transforming individual heartbreak into communal good works, Rabbi Mandell established a camp for children whose parents or siblings were murdered by terrorists. In a country politically and religiously polarized, Rabbi Mandell welcomes victims of all stripes with one healing message.

An American immigrant, Rabbi Mandell is transplanting certain North American ideas into Israel's rocky soil. He adapted American-style summer camping to his campers' needs, offering four short sessions annually. He is also implanting a therapeutic culture into a macho society that often tells victims who have "only" been scarred psychologically to "get over it."

Despite its array of therapists treating 150 kids whose dearest relatives have been murdered, Camp Koby is a happy place. The kids walk around smiling. The staff are warm, huggy, well-trained idealists.

Rabbi Mandell's sensitivity to his campers comes from processing a parent's worst nightmare through a lifetime's worth of wisdom. Transporting campers from 100 different Israeli communities, the buses go house to house. Rabbi Mandell did not want to add errands to the work of the many now-single parents in his target population.

Hearing this characteristic anecdote, seeing the beaming kids, whether frolicking at the pool or doing breathing exercises with a Sephardi kabbalistic yoga master, I began to appreciate how much this miracle worker has helped the 700 relatives of terror victims who have attended the camp – free – over the last three years.

In one therapy session, each camper selected a puzzle piece. Each described the shape's appeal, then decorated it. When assembling the puzzle, one central piece remained missing, representing the hole that violence had ripped in their lives.

I left Camp Koby, mourning the new missing pieces Islamofascists are tearing into the fabrics of so many lives. I wondered about the missing pieces we as parents seek to make our kids feel whole while they develop in trying circumstances. And I missed the missing peace that prevents us all from living the carefree secure lives we and our children deserve.

Grief and responsibility

A few short days before the ceasefire agreement between Israel and Hezbollah fighters based in Lebanon, world media reported on the death of Uri Grossman, an Israeli tank commander killed in southern Lebanon by Hezbollah anti-tank missiles, among the last deployed in the war.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Uri Grossman was the son of the celebrated novelist and political activist David Grossman. The story had special poignance because only a few days earlier, Grossman had publicly called for Israel not to expand the war, and because Grossman's writing focuses on the youth of Israel – their struggle to shape and live out a vision for themselves and their country.

Grossman's hesped, his eulogy, however, left politics and celebrity aside. "You were a son and a friend to me and to Mommy. Our soul is tied to yours." In reading about that family's loss, of the unbearable grief of a father for his son, one hears the multiple echoes of so very many families and households, in the wake of battle. Each fallen soldier's story has its own unique poignance.

In the midst of the conflagration between Israel and Hezbollah, there was the daily news report of casualties of battle – Israel soldiers killed in defence of their country, along with Israeli civilians wounded or killed by shelling in the north.

My niece, whose husband had just received a tsav shmoneh – a call-up for military reserve duty – was discussing international news coverage of the events. She took issue with a particular slant that seemed to govern non-Israeli media: that civilian death was devastating, but the death of soldiers was acceptable. While the news media acknowledged that fallen soldiers were mourned by their families, the presumption was that dying was part of the business of soldiering.

Part of what underwrites that difference in coverage is related to the rules of modern warfare: the immorality of deliberately targeting civilians, of staging acts of terrorism. But the net result, my niece implied, was a devaluation of the life of the individual soldier.

On Israeli television, by contrast, the lost life of each soldier received coverage: where he came from, what he aspired to, who loved him and whom he loved. Not less than the civilian victim of terror or warfare, caught in the wrong place and wrong time, the fallen soldier was depicted as rooted in the fullness of his potential and his life, cut tragically short.

In a way, my niece explained, it can hit you worse to hear about soldiers killed in battle. I asked her why that was so. Certainly in Israel, the line between soldier and civilian is a porous one, a fuzzy one. A man – or a woman – civilian dons a uniform at a particular moment and for a particular function. Unlike in countries without a universal draft, where only a small fraction of the population serves in the military, in Israel most citizens have been both. Virtually everyone is related to soldiers, close friends with soldiers, colleagues of soldiers. Thus, the death of a soldier hits so very close to home.

All that is true, my niece acknowledged, but she meant something else. When you hear about a pigu'a, an act of terrorism, death is random. It could have been you. It wasn't, not this time, but it could have been. But a soldier, she explained, deliberately puts his life at risk, and he does it for you, to protect you, to keep you and your family safe. He dies, you live. The debt runs deep. You feel responsible.

It is this mixture of grief and responsibility that fuels the current mood in Israel: public outcry about the lack of support for reservists sent to Lebanon, about corruption in high places. In a letter circulating on the Internet, for example, one reservist itemizes failure of preparation and lack of basic equipment and, even water. Mi shelo haya sham, pashut lo yavin, the writer repeats – if you weren't there, you simply can't understand.

The demand for accountability to and for soldiers and their families is as vital to Israel's continued welfare as the efforts to repair the pockmarked northern Galilee. Sadly, mourning, healing, moral accounting, and vision cannot wait for a perfect peace.

The Kirshner File

War may bring Israel to talks with Syria

Even as the dust from the recent war in Lebanon settled, top Israeli officials were locked in a heated debate over the wisdom of engaging Syria, one of Hezbollah's chief backers, in a new round of peace talks.

The debate was touched off by Defence Minister Amir Peretz, who said that Israel should "create the conditions for dialogue with Syria," which blamed Israel for igniting the war, stayed out of it and claimed that Hezbollah had come out on top.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Within two days of issuing this pronouncement, Peretz backtracked, saying that conditions were not "ripe" for a resumption of bilateral negotiations, which ended six years ago.

Still, Peretz's proposal struck a chord.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni appointed a special project manager for possible talks with Syria, and Public Security Minister Avi Dichter – a former director of the Shin Bet intelligence agency – released a statement proposing that, in exchange for a peace agreement with Syria, Israel should cede the Golan Heights, captured by the Israeli army during the 1967 Six Day War and annexed by Israel in 1981.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, however, were less than enthusiastic about these proposals.

Olmert said he had no intention of engaging Syria unless it stops its sponsorship of terrorist groups, while Peres suggested that Israel could not seriously negotiate with Syria when the situation in southern Lebanon is so fraught with uncertainty and turmoil still engulfs the Gaza Strip.

Nevertheless, as some observers have noted, Israel may eventually engage Syria so that United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the fighting in Lebanon with a ceasefire, can be fully implemented. As Dennis Ross, the former U.S. envoy to the Middle East, has written, "Implementation… will depend in a large degree on the Syrians."

Damascus may be critical to the success of the resolution because Syria, an ally of the Islamic Republic of Iran, is a transit point through which Iranian weapons and munitions have been funnelled to Hezbollah.

During the war, Israeli aircraft bombed roads and bridges in Lebanon leading into Syria to interrupt Hezbollah's resupply efforts, and strafed vehicles believed to be carrying weaponry bound for Hezbollah.

After the United Nations truce went into effect, Israeli commandos launched a raid near the Syrian border to intercept the flow of such arms. With this in mind, Israel insisted that its acceptance of Resolution 1701 was conditional upon the stationing of an augmented international peacekeeping force along Lebanon's border with Syria.

Two weeks ago, Syria muddied the waters by threatening to close its frontier with Lebanon – which still faces an Israeli air and sea blockade – should the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) patrol the border region. With disingenuous indignation, Syria's president, Bashar Assad, claimed that the deployment of peacekeepers there would undermine Lebanese sovereignty and generate hostility between Syria and Lebanon.

Be that as it may, Syria can play an important role in pacifying Israel's border with Lebanon simply by refusing to allow Iranian rockets and anti-tank missiles to reach Hezbollah, whose armoury of long-range and short-range rockets devastated northern Israel.

Syria can also bring a measure of stability to Lebanon. Last year, after being widely accused of masterminding the assassination of Lebanon's prime minister, Rafik Hariri, Syria grudgingly withdrew its troops and intelligence agents from Lebanon. But Syria, which has neither formally recognized Lebanon's independence nor established an embassy in Beirut, is still influential in Lebanon, and could be a stabilizing force there.

Syria, too, could be useful in settling the Shebaa Farms dispute, which Hezbollah magnified as a flimsy pretext to stir up tensions with Israel prior to the latest war in Lebanon.

A small area lying on the slopes of Mt. Hermon – the highest peak in the area – Shebaa Farms was captured by Israel from Syria during the Six Day War. When Israel unilaterally pulled out of southern Lebanon in May 2000, the United Nations certified its withdrawal, but Hezbollah falsely claimed that Shebaa Farms was Lebanese territory.

Syria and Lebanon cynically supported Hezbollah's stance, and in flaunting that phony claim, Hezbollah tried to wrest Shebaa Farms away from Israel by military means.

If Israel and Syria were to resume negotiations, this nettlesome issue might finally be settled.

Talks with Syria could also result in the closing of Islamic Jihad and Hamas offices in Damascus. Last October, the United Nations, Russia and the European Union joined the United States in demanding such action.

Islamic Jihad has carried out two suicide bombings in Tel Aviv in the past year or so, and Israel has accused Syria of complicity in these attacks.

In 2003, the Israeli air force bombed an empty Palestinian camp in Syria after an Islamic Jihad terrorist detonated a bomb that killed more than 20 Israelis in a Haifa restaurant coowned by Jews and Arabs.

Israeli jets also buzzed Assad's palace in Latakia in June after Hamas' armed wing ambushed a border post inside Israel, killed two soldiers and kidnapped a third, Gilad Shalit. (Recently, King Abdullah II of Jordan accused Syria of encouraging Palestinians in the West Bank to carry out attacks against Israeli civilians and soldiers.)

Syrian President Bashar Assad

Israel's penetration of Syrian air space was widely interpreted as a warning to Syria to expel Hamas leader Khalid Mashaal, who lives in exile in Damascus, whom the Mossad tried to assassinate nine years ago, and who may have ordered the raid that resulted in Shalit's abduction.

Syria did not submit to Israel's demand, but recently, senior Palestinian Authority officials were quoted as saying that only the Syrian government has the clout to exert pressure on Hamas so that Shalit can be set free.

Beyond these factors, an Israeli accommodation with Syria could well impel more Arab states, apart from Egypt and Jordan, to recognize Israel, could weaken Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, and could further isolate Iran.

Certainly, Syria has a vested interest in engaging Israel.

Syria could regain the Golan without shedding a drop of blood, and through Israel, Syria could improve its bilateral ties with the United States – which has imposed economic sanctions on the Syrian regime due to its support for terrorist groups and the current insurgency in Iraq – and the European Union.

In fact, Syria, which has honoured its 1974 disengagement accord with Israel, has expressed a desire to reopen talks with the Jewish state.

Assad, in April 2003, told U.S. congressman Tom Lantos – a Holocaust survivor – of his readiness to restart negotiations at the point where they concluded in January 2000. Subsequently, in an interview with the New York Times, he repeated the offer, saying that 80 per cent of Syria's differences with Israel had already been resolved. And in January 2004, he said that his objective is to reach a peace accord with Israel.

Several months ago, Syria's former vice-president, Abdel Abed al-Halim Haddam, disclosed that Syria and Israel had almost achieved a breakthrough in their 1990s peace talks. "Syria was ready for peace," he claimed, saying that Yitzhak Rabin's 1995 murder had scuppered the chances for a historic agreement.

Israel's previous prime minister, Ariel Sharon, said he was open to renewing talks with Syria, but only if Syria stopped waging a proxy war against Israel through Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad and no longer insisted on an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 borders.

In his last recorded comment on the subject, in November 2005, Sharon ruled out engagement with Syria categorically, saying that he wished to retain the Golan: "I will not negotiate with Syria because I will never leave that area."

Sharon, in common with his predecessors, argued that the Golan is absolutely vital for Israel's security. But Israel's former chief of staff, Gen. Moshe Yaalon, a hawk who may soon join the ranks of Likud, has said that Israel could defend itself without maintaining a grip on the Golan.

The United States, given its grievances against Damascus, has not openly urged Israel to forge a rapprochement with Syria.

But the Bush administration and Israel may yet have to reassess their respective policies, since Syria may hold the key to stability in Lebanon, the future of Hezbollah and the status of Iran in Mideast politics.

Holy Blossom to celebrate its 150th anniversary

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

This year marks the 150th anniversary of the establishment of the Holy Blossom congregation, which held its first service on Rosh Hashanah above Coombes Drugstore at Yonge and Richmond streets in 1856.

Holy Blossom, the oldest Jewish congregation in Toronto, has organized a year-long celebration calendar including "programs, music, lectures, reunions – enough to please everyone, ending with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra performing a special concert in June 2007 at Roy Thomson Hall," said Henrietta Chesnie, president of Holy Blossom from1972 to '74, and the first female vice-president of a Canadian congregation in 1970. She is also chair of the 150th anniversary steering committee.

The celebration's launch, set to take place at the synagogue on Sunday, Sept. 17, will be attended by Gov. Gen. Michaelle Jean and addressed by Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union for Reform Judaism.

"The centrepiece of our celebration is the actual creation by members of our congregation of a new Torah scroll," said Chesnie. "The Torah will be dedicated on May 23, 2007. We are expecting every member of the congregation to participate in one of the great mitzvahs of Judaism."

The journey to 150 followed a long path for the congregation, which began as an Orthodox minyan in 1856 and became Reform in 1920, after moving to a site on Bond Street in 1897. In 1938, the congregation moved to its present site on Bathurst Street.

"The theme for the 150th year is to honour the past, celebrate the present and imagine the future," Chesnie said. "I think ours is a compelling narrative of a religious journey of a congregation from 1856 to the present. Along with building three places of worship to observe Jewish ritual, tradition and education, social issues became a prominent action for this congregation."

Another landmark of Jewish Toronto is being honoured this year as part of Holy Blossom's events. The Pape Avenue Cemetery, built in 1849 and representing the earliest Jewish presence in Toronto, will be dedicated as an Ontario historic site on Sunday, Oct. 22. Also on that day, a bus tour of historic sites of interest to Holy Blossom and the Toronto Jewish community will be conducted.

First services held on Rosh Hashanah in 1856

Chesnie spoke of several main periods in Holy Blossom's history. "During the first three decades, 1856-1886, the English influence was paramount," she said.

Louis Samuel, an English-born Jew who served as president of the congregation for most of the years between 1862 and 1880, was very strongly committed to Orthodox practice, and the condition of building the second synagogue since it was on his land was that they continue to worship according to Orthodox ritual.

The second period, between 1886 and 1920, was a period of transition since the Toronto Jewish population itself was changing. "A large-scale immigration of Yiddish-speaking Jews from eastern Europe contributed to Holy Blossom losing its dominance over the Toronto Jewish religious life, and the congregation changed to a modified version of the Orthodox ritual," Chesnie said.

From 1920 to '43, Chesnie said the English influence almost disappeared, and American-style classical Reform became the mode of practice under three rabbis – Barnett Brickner, Ferdinand Isserman and Maurice Eisendrath.

"The fourth period began in 1943 with the arrival of Rabbi Abraham Feinberg. Under his leadership, the congregation's membership almost tripled. It was during Rabbi Feinberg's tenure that the influence of classical Reform began to wane, primarily as a result of the impact of the Holocaust. Rabbi Feinberg was strongly supportive of Israel and for a greater use of Hebrew. He was primarily involved with social causes, and he had a very high profile in the anti-Vietnam War movement.

"Rabbi Gunther Plaut was senior rabbi at Holy Blossom between 1961 and 1977. The congregation continued to move away from classical Reform and placed more emphasis on Torah study. The membership of the congregation continued to grow, reaching over 2,700 families by 1977."

Chesnie believes that almost every Jew would feel comfortable at Holy Blossom today. "More of the reading is in Hebrew, there's a lot more singing. I think we're a very well-grounded group of Jews, practising their religion and studying, and having a wonderful education setup for the children. That's what people are interested in today, and that's what they're getting here."

What the future holds, however, remains to be seen. "The future presents a tremendous challenge for Jewish institutions and for synagogues particularly. It is vitally important that we bring up a generation of Jews who will then bring up a generation of Jews. In order to do that we have to strengthen their Jewish identity, teach them the values and the traditions of our great books, and hope that by making the synagogue strong, their identification with Judaism will safeguard the future," Chesnie said.

Dr. Adam Chapnick
A Look at Canadian Foreign Policy:
Reality and Illusion
The Middle East Crises - A Case in Point

Dr. Chapnick will use examples from history and the recent Middle East crisis to argue that we have, in Canada, a strong tradition of defining, and indeed misrepresenting, our foreign policy through empty words. WE use passionate, morally-charged language to create the illusion of committed leadership, open minded neutrality, and principled policy, when in reality there has generally been very little in terms of action to back it up.

Dr. Chapnick is Assistant Professor of Defence Studies and Deputy Chair of the Department of Command, Leadership and Management at the Canadian Forces College.

Lecture at 8 p.m.

Everyone is invited to attend.
There is no charge. Light Refreshments.

Our lives are in critical condition

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

I once lived in Brooklyn, N.Y. Brooklyn is not a happy place for car owners. In fact, the same can be said for most of New York City. New York City operates under the rule of alternate-side-of-the-street parking. That means that on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, it is legal to park on one side of the street, and on Tuesday and Thursday, it is legal to park on the other side.

The rule is designed to make street sweeping possible and clear a route for sanitation trucks. Vehicles that violate the rule are promptly towed and fined. Alternate-side-of-the-street parking takes effect at 8 a.m.

So by 7:15 or 7:30 a.m., it was not uncommon to see dozens of drivers sitting nervously in their cars, waiting for parking spaces to become available as people drove away to go to work. Like hungry beasts of prey, drivers would lie in wait, waiting to pounce on the first available parking space on the alternate side.

But it is not my New York experience alone that conditioned me to live under the threat of deadlines. Deadlines are not restricted to parking rules. Our lives are circumscribed by many deadlines, due dates and expiration dates. Students must complete assignments on time. Library books must be returned on time. Bills must be paid on time or additional charges and interests will be applied. Products are scrutinized for their expiration dates.

Even our lives have an expiry. Intellectually, we know that our lives may end with our next breath. Emotionally, however, we refuse to accept that fact. We tell our friends or co-workers "See you tomorrow!" as if it is a guarantee. While our lives are ever on the brink, we seem to ignore that fact, less out of ignorance than out of defiance.

Dr. Norman Shumway, a renowned California cardiologist, once completed an early heart transplant operation at Stanford University.

An interviewing reporter asked: "How is your patient doing?"

"All right, I suppose," was the reply.

The reporter followed up. "What is his condition?"

Shumway gave a one word answer: "Critical."

Trying to extract more information, the reporter asked persistently: "And how long will he be critical?"

Shumway then offered an observation as much as an answer. Said the doctor, "He will be critical as long as he lives."

That describes us. Our lives, too, are critical. We are constantly in jeopardy. Few of us acknowledge it. All of us must deal with it.

Now we can understand this talmudic gem (Shabbat 153a). "Rabbi Eliezer says: 'Repent one day before you die.' His students ask him: 'But Master, does a man know which day will be his last?' He replies: 'Even the more reason to repent today since perhaps you shall die tomorrow.'"

Rabbi Eliezer asserts that our spiritual lives are in critical condition as surely as our physical lives are in critical condition. That is why pious Jews confess their sins nightly before going to sleep. Death may overtake us suddenly, without warning. And should we be spared and wake up again the next morning, we take comfort in knowing that we had confessed. For doing so gives us a deeper understanding of ourselves and lead us in firm resolve to live more uprightly thereafter.

And that is why we schedule a penitential period in the Jewish calendar. The Slichot prayers for forgiveness and mercy, beginning before Rosh Hashanah, are our deadline. The ominous Days of Awe are imminent. Living in the shadow of this deadline compels us to take notice of our failings and to act before the deadline expires.

Rabbi Allen is the spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

Midrashic Moments

As we approach Rosh Hashanah and continue to spend the month of Elul in self-reflection, an interesting detail emerges from this week's Torah reading. The Israelites are told that when they finally enter the Land of Israel, they are to bring offerings and retell the history of the Covenant. They must recount the patriarchal and matriarchal promises of land, inheritance and a unique relationship with God. Interesting that at the moment when they stand at the threshold of their future, they are to recount their past.

Likewise there is an interesting comparison between the Jewish New Year, Rosh Hashanah, and the secular new year of Jan. 1. Usually, Jan. 1 is marked by new year's resolutions – a list of promises and projections each person puts together that is personal and full of vision and hope for the future. Fitness centres show increased membership in January that usually tapers off by mid-February. There are promises to begin with healthy habits and abandon unhealthy routines. The lists abound with hope. Most of these resolutions go unfulfilled in any long-term way.

By contrast, Elul, the month before Rosh Hashanah is not spent on creating projections for the future. The month of Elul and the holiday of Rosh Hashanah itself are intensive, as we reflect on the past year, not the year to come. Days and weeks are spent asking ourselves hard questions about the choices already made and the things already said. We stand at the edge of the year to come, but we ignore its potential until we have dealt with the year that has been.

Elul is also a time of the year when the sages have told us that God and Israel are intimately connected and expressing the love of their relationship. The Hebrew letters of the word "Elul" also stand for the Hebrew phrase "I am for my beloved and my beloved is for me," one of the most beautiful verses in the Song of Songs.

With all of the trials and tribulations we experience in the world and in our lives, it is important to have a period of time to reconnect with the spiritually emotional. The relationship we have with God is that of beloved partners. As with any intimate relationship, we can argue, we can disagree, we can yell and say things we regret. In the end, the strength of the relationship increases with the awareness of the bonds of the past and shared experiences.

In essence, there are two ways to approach any relationship. One can quickly and superficially race into the future with all good intention and the best laid plans. Time and experience have shown that this approach has inconsistent results. On the other hand, one can ground future plans in past realities. The progress forward is slower, since there is more reflection and education required for this approach. However, the outcome should prove to be more durable and more enduring.

Within Jewish history and the Jewish community, we have ample experience of both approaches. We have the inclination to rush and get caught up in visions of outcomes while ignoring the hard work needed to question process as well as outcome. But we also have millennia of experience and literature that caution us to take the slow but proven approach.

A midrash in the Talmud explains that the covenantal promise was given with two opposite images: dust of the earth and stars of the sky. The children of Israel are promised to become like both. Both images are necessary, says the Talmud, since at times, we can be as petty and superficial as the dust of the earth, and at other times, we push ourselves and attain the stars. The month of Elul affords us an entire month within which to make our choice.

Jewish Life

Coming full circle

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

Deir Dibwan is a sleepy Arab village outside of Ramallah not far from Jerusalem. At least that is the way I remember it.

It was the place where I would first get the chance to excavate a biblical site. I remember lying awake tossing and turning at home in Toronto the night before my departure on this epic adventure and not being able to sleep. I got up and turned on the TV.

Many channels were reporting on the results of the Democratic primary for president of the United States that was being held in California. Robert Kennedy had just beaten the other contenders and appeared to be on his way to getting the Democratic nomination. Shortly after receiving the news of his victory, Kennedy was headed to a celebration at the Roosevelt Hotel when a gunman jumped out of the crowd and fatally shot him. Millions of us sat there horrified in front of our television sets with a terrible case of déjà vu.

That awful memory got pushed to the back of my mind as I settled into the pace of life at Deir Dibwan. It was like being transported thousands of years back in time, to a world that moved no faster than the ubiquitous donkeys that transported us, and our equipment, to the excavations. Near the town is the imposing archeological ruin of biblical Ai, known to the Arabs as Et-Tell, which also happens to mean "the ruin." Ai is situated on the eastern ridge of the Judean Hills before it precipitously drops more than 1,000 metres to the Jordan-Dead Sea Valley. I never tired of seeing that breathtaking view in almost two months of living at Deir Dibwan Looking at the sun rise from the Jordanian highlands like a giant orange ball reminded me of a scene from the movie Lawrence of Arabia.

Ai had initially been excavated in the early 1930s by Judith Marquet-Krause, a gorgeous and brilliant young Jewish archeologist from France, who had bewitched the Rothschilds with her double dose of beauty and brains into funding her excavations. She died tragically, and very young. Thirty-five years later I was part of a group of Canadians excavating the site, but the bulk of the supervisory staff were Americans, primarily from Southern Baptist Seminary in Louisville, Ky., where the director, Joe Callaway taught. Callaway was a soft-spoken southerner with a typical drawl. Although he came from a fundamentalist region, he was quite a respected excavator, having gotten his training with the legendary English archeologist Dame Kathleen Kenyon. (Kenyon gained her fame through her excavations of Jericho in the 1950s and Jerusalem in the early '60s. Her partner in both of these endeavours was A.D. Tushingham, chief archeologist of the Royal Ontario Museum, where part of her discoveries are still housed. Her discoveries, and the stories in the Toronto newspapers, helped put archeology on the map in Toronto).

We found many fascinating things that summer at Ai and its vicinity. The site itself was settled at the dawn of civilization some 5,000 years ago. It was one of the largest cities in ancient Canaan (the name of Israel before the Israelites). One of the things we uncovered dating from this period at the beginning of the Bronze Age (circa 3000 – 1200 BCE) was an expanse of city wall standing to a height of four metres in places.

At the top of the citadel, we found the remains of a four-room, pillared house identified by some archeologists as one of the earliest examples of Israelite habitation. Near another Arab village farther down the wadi leading up to Ai from the Jordan valley were the remains of a Byzantine monastery. Not far from it were tombs from the time of Herod.

One day one of my workmen asked me if I knew a friend of his from Deir Dibwan. I was perplexed; how could I know someone from an insignificant Arab village? Then he told me the man's name and I froze – it was Sirhan Sirhan, the assassin of Robert Kennedy. I had come full circle since my departure.

The Jewish calendar, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are now well into the month of Elul, the last month of the year preceding Rosh Hashanah. This is a time to take stock of our conduct during the past year, look at our goals for the coming one… and, of course, pick up a new Jewish calendar. You can get one from your nearest Judaica store or bakery or on the Jewish Internet.

There are two basic kinds of calendar programs on the Internet. Some programs are built right into a web page. Typically, you type in the information you want, hit enter and you get your response. There are also some calendar programs that you can download onto your computer and use whenever you want. These programs are usually more sophisticated and may or may not be free.

In the web-based category, I highly recommend the Hebcal Interactive Jewish Calendar. Plug in the name of your city, or your longitude and latitude, and customize whether you'd like the Hebrew date, holidays or that week's Torah portion to appear. Click and you have a personalized calendar. You can even export the results to other programs. [www.hebcal.com/hebcal/]

The Ezras Torah foundation is known for its information-packed wall and pocket calendars. That calendar is now available online. The real benefit of this calendar is the detailed explanation about major holiday-related customs for the coming year and specific notes about possible exceptions. For example, next year when the first day of Sukkot falls on Shabbat, we are reminded not to wave the lulav. [www.ezrastorah.org/calendar.htm]

Some online calendars are specialized. Andrew Tannenbaum's 50 Year Yahrzeit Calendar Calculator does exactly what it promises. Plug in a date (using either the Jewish or civil calendar) and the page generates a list that tells you when the yahrzeit will fall. [http://shamash.org/trb/yahr/]

Rather than looking everything up on the web, you may want a stand-alone calendar program that has more functions. There are plenty that you can purchase, but I have come across some that you can download free. (Some do ask for a donation, though.) Aish Hatorah's Aish Luach (for Windows) lets you look up birthdays, yahrzeits and can be set for hundreds of cities around the world. [http://tinyurl.com/39ghu] If you use Windows 2000, you can download a Jewish calendar add-in for Outlook. [http://tinyurl.com/lgxdy] More recent versions of Outlook have that functionality built in. The Microsoft site explains how you can make use of it. [http://tinyurl.com/qxz52]

Mac users haven't been forgotten. Although it doesn't boast as many features as Aish Luach, Jewish Calendar also does a solid job. [http://tinyurl.com/47axg] If you want to carry your Jewish calendar with you, download the free Der Tog program for your Palm running OS 5. [www.tichnut.de/dertog/] And check out the great Tichnut page for a summary of other Jewish calendar programs – some free, some not – that you can download. (Please note that I have not tested most of these calendars.) [www.tichnut.de/jewish/]

Just a reminder that many of these programs are "shareware." Shareware is software provided to you on the honour system. Try it. And if you like it, you are expected to pay for it. And what better time to take stock of all those shareware programs you're using but have forgotten to pay for than before Rosh Hashanah.

Rather than give you a calendar, the Hagshama site breathes some life into it by telling you about a Jewish event that has occurred for every date of the year. Did you know that on Sept. 2, 1825, Mordechai Manuel Noah "led a parade in New York City declaring Grand Island, N.Y., a Jewish city? The 2,500-acre island… was part of the Noah Colonization dream to provide a refuge for his Jewish brethren. He was to call his city Ararat. Few people took him up on his dream and the plan soon disintegrated." The vast majority of dates in the Hagshama calendar, though, refer to various pogroms, blood libels and forced conversions that have been perpetrated against Jews over the centuries. [http://tinyurl.com/q6c8y]

Though the programs I've mentioned do a fine job of calculating dates, even the Internet still can't create a free glossy calendar that comes with lovely photos of sunrise over Masada or sunset at the Kotel. Maybe that bakery-shop calendar isn't threatened, yet.

Beit Rayim rabbi wants to share love of Judaism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The new rabbi at Beit Rayim Synagogue – one of only two egalitarian congregations affiliated with the Conservative movement in the GTA, the other being a small grassroots congregation in Mississauga – says he could not imagine serving comfortably in a congregation that was not egalitarian. He admits, however, that originally his head "wrapped itself around the idea a lot more quickly than my kishkas did."

Rabbi David Eligberg, a 46-year-old native of Montreal who attended United Talmud Torah and Herzliah High School, grew up in the traditional Conservative congregation Shaare Zedek. He said his philosophy began to change as he "came to embrace egalitarianism as a legitimate and valid model of Conservative Judaism" once he started reading responsa on the issue as a student at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in New York.

The avid Montreal Canadiens fan was ordained in 1985, the year JTS began to ordain women. He also has a degree in political science from Columbia University.

Rabbi Eligberg, who moved here from North Brunswick, N.J., where he served Congregation B'nai Tikvah for 11 years, also serves as principal of Beit Rayim's congregational school. He began his career as an assistant rabbi in Long Island, N.Y., and has also led a congregation in Yardley, Pa.

The rabbi was still settling in as of last week, shortly after he took on his new position Aug. 15. He replaces Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf, the congregation's previous spiritual leader, who died earlier this year.

Beit Rayim appealed to Rabbi Eligberg in large part for its informality, warmth and "heimish" quality, he said in a recent interview amid stacks of boxes in his new office.

Also, he added, the 230-family congregation is "committed to its future [and] looking to grow," not just in size but in terms of Jewish experiences.

Beit Rayim recently moved out of its Bayview Avenue location in Richmond Hill, following the building's sale to a developer. The synagogue's offices are now located on Centre Street in Thornhill, near the Reena Battle Centre. Services will be held there until permanent premises, together with United Synagogue Day School, are completed at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan in fall of 2008.

High Holy Days services, as in past years, will be at the Bayview Hill Community Centre and Hebrew school classes will be held at Ross Doan Public School on Weldrick Road West.

Rabbi Eligberg's biggest passion is Judaism, he said. "I really believe that Judaism has something to teach us that can guide us in all aspects of our lives."

Rabbi David Eligberg

One of those aspects has to do with environmentalism, an issue on which the rabbi has spoken out in his previous congregation.

Other issues with which he has been involved include interfaith dialogue and human rights in Darfur.

The rabbi – a father of three young children who drives a Honda Accord – said he's "not going to suggest we all sit at home and not use our vehicles, not turn on a light or any of the other things that have become part of our natural everyday lifestyle, but I think there are ways we can lessen our impact by being more conscious and more aware of what we do."

Rabbi Eligberg, who entered the rabbinate to share his love of "Judaism and what it can bring into our world," said that at Beit Rayim he wants to "create as many opportunities as possible for people to engage in and experience Jewish life."

In his former congregation, he and his wife, Jodi – an attorney by training who has recently been teaching toddler music classes – held Shabbat afternoon open houses for congregants to "give people an opportunity to see what a restful, relaxing and religious experience Shabbat can be.

"That's really my goal… to engage people in the Jewish journey, to make sure they're moving somewhere along the Jewish highway of life toward a destination of greater involvement and participation and engagement with God."

The rabbi has not taken a public stand on the gay/lesbian issue, which the movement's committee on law and standards will be voting on in December. "Part of me is waiting to see what the law committee will put forth in the way of tshuvot or readings. Those will help me crystallize my own thinking on the subject."

Har Zion rabbi adds a new musical note to services

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Speaking about the rabbinic thesis he wrote in 1993 on an Aramaic text called Dream of Mordechai, Rabbi Cory Weiss said he loves a challenge.

Rabbi Weiss, who has been spiritual leader at Temple Har Zion in Thornhill since July, said he does not know of any other English-language critical edition of the text nor of one in any language more recent than 1895.

In an interview at the synagogue, Rabbi Weiss, 41, said he took on the project as a student after asking his thesis adviser at Hebrew Union College to find him a text that needed work.

A native of New York who moved to Stamford, Conn., at age eight with his family, Rabbi Weiss replaces Rabbi Michal Shekel, who served as interim rabbi for the past year following the retirement of Rabbi Michael Stroh. Rabbi Stroh, now rabbi emeritus, was the Thornhill congregation's rabbi since its founding in 1971.

Rabbi Weiss said his first priority at Har Zion – already under way – is getting to know his congregants, made up of some 450 households. Also, he said, post-bar and -bat mitzvah education, youth programming and adult education are "very important" to him.

Recently, he attended a meeting of Mosaic, the interfaith group of clergy and lay leaders co-founded by Rabbi Stroh more than 25 years ago. For Rabbi Weiss, involvement in the group, which represents a variety of faiths, expands on the Jewish-Christian interfaith work in which he was involved in more homogeneous rural Connecticut.

Rabbi Weiss led Congregation Beth Shalom Rodfe Zedek in Chester, Conn., for six years until 2005. Prior to that, he served a West Hartford congregation as associate rabbi.

Other issues he was involved in included hunger relief and civil rights work.

Unlike some of his American colleagues in the Reform movement – and in line with Reform rabbis in the Toronto area – Rabbi Weiss does not officiate at interfaith marriages. However, he is "firmly committed to outreach and welcoming interfaith families into the congregation."

He is a supporter of same-sex marriage, but has never officiated at one. "My inclination would be to officiate, but I need to learn the lay of the land and not turn the synagogue on its head."

Judaism, particularly Reform Judaism, has always been an evolving religion, he said.

Rabbi Weiss' office at Har Zion, with its book-lined shelves, attests to his love of learning; he has studied Aramaic, Syriac and Esperanto. A selection of books was on his desk as he prepared for Shabbat services last week.

One – perhaps surprisingly – was Etz Hayim, the new Conservative chumash published in 2003. "I'm a committed, devoted Reform Jew," said Rabbi Weiss, "but I'm also devoted to studying from all the sources I can." Rabbi Gunther Plaut's Torah commentary was also on his desk, he noted, citing the best known work of the venerated Reform rabbi.

Rabbi Cory Weiss

Last year, in a semi-sabbatical year, Rabbi Weiss served an unaffiliated Conservative-style synagogue in Connecticut, a stint he described as "a great learning experience. They were flexible, and I was flexible. It was a good shidduch."

On a recent Shabbat, Rabbi Weiss played his accordion at Har Zion's morning services for the first time.

He said he's never been able to play guitar, a more common instrument at some Reform services. However, music has held a prominent place in his life and his career. Among his musical credits, Rabbi Weiss counts The Song of the Sea for cantor and children's choir, which was commissioned by a New Jersey congregation. It was published by Transcontinental Music in 1997.

Rabbi Weiss said his musical style has been influenced by composers like Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copeland and Stephen Sondheim.

As an undergraduate at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, where he received a bachelor of music degree, Rabbi Weiss majored in French horn performance. He has been playing piano since age five.

He took up the accordion in Israel during the first year of his rabbinical program, figuring that as a pianist, he was halfway to learning accordion, because of the keys on the instrument's right side.

During that year he also met his wife, Karen Winkler Weiss, a Jewish educator who was a fellow student at HUC. They have two sons, age 10 and 15.

He continued his rabbinical studies at the HUC campus in Los Angeles for two years, with his final two years at HUC in New York.

Rabbi Weiss said he fell in love with Toronto as a 14-year-old when he visited the city with his school's math and science club to see the Ontario Science Centre, but it wasn't until a former rabbinical school classmate told him about the opening at Har Zion that he thought seriously about moving here.

Waltman new USDS principal at Bathurst campus

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ashley Waltman, new principal at United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst Street campus, has a master's degree in education and another in biology.

The Toronto native and lifelong resident says he chose to pursue a career in education rather than science for the same reason that he hopes motivates other educators: the feeling that he could make a difference.

Ashley Waltman

His move to USDS follows a 32-year career in the public school system, most recently at North Toronto Collegiate Institute for the past seven years until his retirement from the Toronto District School Board this summer. Last year he travelled to Shanghai as part of a TDSB team to establish relationships between the Toronto board and its Shanghai counterpart.

Being at USDS – moving from high school to elementary/middle school, and from the public school system to the Jewish day school system – is "fantastic, so invigorating" at this stage of his career, said Waltman, 56, in an interview last week in his office at the campus located at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

As a Conservative Jew – he is a former brotherhood president at Adath Israel Congregation – he is also excited about being at a Conservative Jewish day school. "This is who I am."

As principal, he sees it as his role to encourage his 412 students, as well as his staff, "with the emphasis on the first. The second is a way of doing the first."

On a personal level, he enjoys interacting with individual students, including informal hallway conversations. Rumour had it he knew every student by name at his former school, he said. "It wasn't true. I wish I knew more."

He has also been known to go into classes to teach, usually a physics lesson. He has his special education qualification, and at one point taught Grade 12 gifted physics. At Northern, he coached the girls' volleyball team and the boys' basketball team.

Waltman says he does not ask staff to do anything he wouldn't do himself, whether it's going in early, coaching a team or participating on committees.

Although he recognizes that USDS students – probably most day school students – could use more time for physical education and arts, and he believes in making that happen at lunchtime and before and after hours, Waltman said that he has heard "loud and clear" from parents that they want their children to be prepared academically. "That cannot be compromised for anything. It's a challenge at any day school."

It would be a mistake, he said, for him to "try to change the world too quickly."

Curriculum content, he believes, is "the vehicle for the really big understanding that will allow [students] to excel in society – the curiosity, self-awareness, confidence, all those kinds of things."

At a Jewish day school, he said, there is the added component of building a Jewish identity, which is "important in terms of continuity of our religion."

Nothing, he said, should interfere with the students' ability to learn and the teachers' ability to teach. If there is a problem, such as a behavioural issue, he believes it should be addressed collaboratively by parents, teachers and students.

He sees his new role as being filled with "all sorts of new challenges.

"I'm too driven," he said. "I can't retire."

A day of family fun to help Shaare Zedek

Enjoy a fun day in the sun at On the Run 2006, the second annual family fitness day to raise funds for the Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

Organized by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, the event will be held Sunday, Sept. 17, at Earl Bales Park in Toronto. Join family and friends walking and running in support of the hospital's department of pediatric medicine, which exemplifies the medical centre's reputation as Israel's "Hospital with a Heart" by blending state-of-the-art technology with compassionate patient care.

The doctors, nurses, teachers, therapists and researchers there have developed special treatments that use art, as well as animal and music therapy to help the children and their families cope.

On the Run participants can take part in a day that includes a 5-km trail run, a guided nature walk, breakfast, children's music and activities, massage, yoga, pilates and stretching, as well as amazing prizes.

To register online go to https://secure.e2rm.com/registrant/startup.aspx?eventid=7395, or visit the website at www.hospitalwithaheart.ca.

Shaare Zedek is known for its century-long reputation for treating patients rather than just their illnesses.

Program aims to improve Jewish non-profit camping

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Three directors of overnight camps in Ontario will be part of the Foundation for Jewish Camping's Executive Leadership Institute (ELI) for camp leaders across North America.

"Twenty people have been selected for the first cohort," said Amy Kruglak, director of operations of the project, which will kick off in October. "This is our first group, and during that time, they're going to be learning much more in depth about leadership and management skills."

The program's primary aim, she said, is to help Jewish not-for-profit overnight camps better attract campers. "Basically, it's taking the best practices from the business world, in terms of leadership and management, and teaching this group of 20 how to take these skills [and] incorporate them into their current stock management style so that they can further develop themselves and their program. An intensive management development program is one way of looking at it."

The project was announced in March at the foundation's Leaders Assembly in Washington. Thirty-three camp directors applied for places in the program: they had to answer five essay questions and attend an interview. Those selected for ELI were notified at the end of May, prior to the 2006 summer camp season.

"There were questions about life-defining moments; questions about what Jewish identity means; the goals that each of us [has]. Everyone had the same five questions. Many of them related back to the goals of the camp and many of them were personal because they wanted to get an idea of who each of us was," said Miriam Allman, director of Camp Moshava in Ontario, who was selected to be in the first cohort.

Ron Polster of the Union of Reform Judaism's Camp George in Parry Sound, and Michael Wolf from Camp Ramah in Utterson were the other Canadian directors chosen.

"[ELI] is going to enhance and improve our camp because we're exposed to tremendous professionals in the field, both from the for-profit and the not-for-profit world. [We'll become aware of] things that we can try to do to make our camps better places to be," Allman said.

ELI faculty include television producer, TV commentator and executive coach, Richard Levin, as well as Joseph Reimer, director of the Institute for Informal Jewish Education and associate professor and former director of the Hornstein Program in Jewish Communal Service at Brandeis University.

"Richard Levin and Joseph Reimer are our core faculty. Very early on, when Jerry [Silverman, president of the Foundation for Jewish Camping] had developed the concepts of this program, he knew of [Levin and Reimer] and contacted them to ask if they were interested in putting together a concept," said Kruglak. "And now we're thrilled that the concept is coming to reality."

Not-for-profit camps, which have boards of directors and are commonly affiliated with movements "are primarily mission camps where their importance is to convey the mission of raising children with a very strong Jewish identity," said Kruglak. "Private camps don't have the same mission focus typically."

Kruglak said not-for-profit camps are no more difficult to run than private camps, though they face "unique" challenges.

"This program will help them to mitigate some of those challenges and to understand that the not-for-profit camps spend a lot of time on the educational program of the camp… whether it's Zionistic and Israel-focused or [Jewishly focused in other ways]," she said.

The first of seven ELI seminars takes place Oct. 17 to 19 in Wellesley, Mass.

"We are asking [the participants] to submit 10 different pictures describing who they are, through the lens of their camp," said Kruglak. "When they present to the group in October, they will be presenting themselves – who they are, what they are passionate about – as well as their camp."

Nasrallah admission changes the story

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Coverage of the aftermath of the Israeli-Hezbollah war changed dramatically after Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah admitted in an Aug. 27 interview on Lebanese TV that he would never have authorized the abduction of two Israeli soldiers had he known how strongly Israel would retaliate.

"Had we known that that the kidnapping of the soldiers would have led to this, we definitely would not have done it… We did not think that there was a one per cent chance that the kidnapping would have led to a war of this scale and magnitude," Nasrallah said.

Suddenly the prevailing narrative in which Nasrallah was the victor over Israel – and a "resistance" hero throughout the Middle East – yielded to a different storyline. Nasrallah was seen as the leader of a movement that had brought enormous destruction on the heads of ordinary people due to his reckless actions. Some reporters discovered a growing backlash against Nasrallah and Hezbollah that cut across all segments of the Lebanese public – Christian, Druze, Sunni and even some Shiite.

On CBC Radio World Report (Aug. 28), Mike Hornbrook reported from Beirut as UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan arrived to shore up the fragile ceasefire. Among other things, Annan called for the release of the two kidnapped Israeli soldiers. Hornbrook remarked: "The abductions triggered the war that has brought so much destruction and misery to Lebanon."

Hornbrook said that criticism of Hezbollah in Lebanon had been "muted" but was "starting to emerge."

He interviewed a Lebanese man who blamed Hezbollah for the destruction of his village. The villager said: "Some people hate Hezbollah. I think 90 per cent hate Hezbollah."

Hornbrook concluded by noting that an Aug. 28 opinion poll found that a small majority (51 per cent) of Lebanese want Hezbollah to give up its weapons and "huge majorities of Christians and Druze support disarmament."

In "Hezbollah blamed for reopening rifts" (National Post, Aug. 29), Thanassis Cambanis of the Boston Globe describes growing sectarian discord in Lebanon, including calls by members of the Sunni and Druze sects to acquire weapons of their own "to counter Hezbollah's." Cambanis notes the danger of a return to the civil war that racked Lebanon from 1975 to 1990.

Cambanis writes that instead of blaming Israel for their internal conflicts, "angry Lebanese have begun blaming the Shiite militant group [Hezbollah] for reopening the dangerous sectarian rifts."

Cambanis quotes a Christian shop owner: "Hezbollah made this war and ruined the whole country. We paid in blood and in young men… As long as Hezbollah exists, and has weapons, there will be war."

The Druze, who comprise 10 per cent of the population, are led by Walid Jumblatt. According to Cambanis, Jumblatt is "Nasrallah's loudest detractor, accusing Hezbollah of serving foreign masters in Iran and Syria at the expense of the Lebanese people."

Sunnis, too, along with a declining Christian population (many of whom are making plans to leave Lebanon for the West) are both resentful and fearful of Hezbollah – and the Shiites' – growing power and influence.

In a New York Times story ("At funeral, a Sunni village condemns Hezbollah's presence," Aug. 25), Hassan Fattah reports how residents of the predominantly Sunni village of Marwaheen, near the border with Israel, expressed bitter resentment against Hezbollah over losing family members who became casualties of the conflict with Israel. Fattah quotes one Sunni villager, Zainab Abdullah: "We kept beseeching [Hezbollah], 'Stay out! Stay out!' They said, 'We're all in the same boat together, so deal with it.' But why should our children die for their cause?"

In the meantime, Hezbollah continues to defy the UN resolutions calling for its disarmament. While a UN peacekeeping force of up to 15,000 is supposed to be deployed alongside 15,000 Lebanese soldiers, there is no mandate to disarm Hezbollah – or orders to prevent Syria and Iran from resupplying Hezbollah with weapons, including long-range missiles.

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah

Nasrallah's conciliatory-sounding words are designed perhaps to enhance his political standing among an increasingly critical population. But many Lebanese and Israelis believe it might be only a matter of time before a new round of fighting breaks out. Whether internal Lebanese strife can be avoided in the interim remains to be seen.

Students learn from each other at summer retreat

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

More than 70 Jewish student leaders, from Victoria, B.C., to Prince Edward Island, attended the second annual summer retreat organized by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students last month.

"This was the second annual national leadership retreat. It was created by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) to foster a national network of communication among campus leaders and, furthermore, to get motivated and excited for the upcoming school year," said Melissa Lantsman, president and fourth-year economic-urban studies student at University of Toronto.

The four-day retreat, held at Camp George in Parry Sound, Ont., from Aug. 24 to 27, saw student leaders affiliated with organizations including Hillel, Jewish student associations, Jewish law student associations, and Alpha Epsilon Pi and Delta Phi (Jewish fraternity and sorority groups) from more than 20 university campuses nationwide.

"We discussed the concerns of what might happen on campus in September. We got [everyone] to basically learn from each other in terms of successes and mistakes," Lantsman said.

There were many speakers at the retreat, she said, covering such topics as leadership development, Jewish identity, social justice, fundraising, communications, "the Jewish tradition of disagreement," effective leadership and crisis management.

"We had sessions, with the help of the Jewish community staff from all across Canada – Hillel staff in particular – and we had sessions regarding bridge-building and working with staff," she said.

Speakers included Ben Fefferman, the Canadian co-ordinator of Hasbara Fellowships, a non-profit group that provides information on pro-Israel activism; Mark Anshan, United Jewish Appeal general counsel and former director of the Canada-Israel Committee; Matthew Godwin, the national chair of SHOUT (Students Helping Others Understand Tolerance); Jared Isaacson, director of leadership development at National Jewish Campus Life; and Michal Kayne, director of the Israel Program Centre.

"We had activities [related to] national campaigns and national initiatives, based on Jewish identity," Lantsman said.

Other highlights included Shabbat with Rabbi Aaron Levy, the new rabbi and director at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Life, an Oneg Shabbat and an Israel-themed beach party.

"It was an amazing display of proud Jewish identity and [the start of] a brand new national network," Lantsman said.

Graduate students hope to inspire youth to give back

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

From left, Jessica Feldman, Esti Goldbach and Gabi Cohen, the co-founders and co-chairs of Young at Heart.

They grew up together, went to school together and now they are giving back to the community together.

Gabi Cohen, Jessica Feldman and Esti Goldbach, three graduate students, are the co-founders and co-chairs of Young at Heart, a foundation that aims to give charity to those who need it most.

"Young at Heart is a foundation we started this year and our project right now is to raise money for the hematology/ oncology ward at the Hospital for Sick Children, but additionally our focus is to foster the importance of charity among our peers," said Goldbach, 23, who is currently doing her co-op at a hospital as part of her health service management MBA at McMaster University.

"We were fortunate enough to share in the joys of childhood together and we wanted to help kids, who are forced to grow up too fast, to continue to indulge in the joys of youth," said Feldman, a 22-year-old, second-year Osgoode Hall Law School student.

With the support of the Sick Kids Foundation and a nine-person committee consisting of students and young professionals, Young at Heart has planned a gala for Sunday, Sept. 10 at the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto.

Feldman explained that she, Goldbach and Cohen, who is a 22-year-old student in a combined law and business program at Osgoode and Schulich School of Business, decided to plan this gala based on the experience they had while students at McGill University.

"It started two years ago when we started fundraising for the Quebec Breast Cancer Foundation in Montreal and we had helped plan two afternoon galas in a very similar format to what we're having here," she said.

"After the success of those, and now that we already know how to plan fundraisers and know about the personal satisfaction of raising a lot of money and doing something for the community, we decided that we would use our skills for the Toronto community and give it a go here," Feldman added.

The afternoon gala, which is set to begin at 1 p.m. on Sunday, will include speakers, musical entertainment by an A Capella group called Onoscatopoeia, a performance by mentalist Haim Goldenberg, a silent auction, a raffle and more.

"This event is meant to celebrate childhood and it is sort of a fun way to give back," Feldman said.

While the theme of the gala is a return to one's youth, Dr. Michael Capra, a full-time physician in the hematology/oncology division at the Hospital for Sick Children, will address the guests, as will a child cancer survivor and a father of a leukemia survivor.

The silent auction will include products ranging from an LCD TV, satellite radio, gift cards from clothing stores, a Kaplan Test Prep Course, and sporting goods.

But what makes Young at Heart different from other charities, they say, is that not only do they raise money for good causes, but they also make it a priority to foster the value of charity within the younger generation in the local community.

"We also just like the idea of making charity very accessible to young people and students," Feldberg said.

"I think we realized that even at our age, being university students, we were able to do so much. We were able to get other students involved, and we're meeting such inspirational people along the way," said Goldbach, who hopes to sell about 300 tickets.

"Ideally, we hope that people will come to the event and be inspired."

Tickets cost $25 for students and $40 for general admission. For more information, visit www.youngatheart2006.com.

A man for all seasons

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Prominent Toronto lawyer Edwin (Eddie) Alan Goodman, a man for all seasons – a giant in his profession, a decorated war hero, a leader to his people, a powerful political strategist municipally, provincially and nationally, an outdoorsman and a patron of the arts – died of the ravages of Alzheimer's and heart disease on Aug. 23. He was 87.

Goodman was a renaissance Jew, a prototype of a Canadian Jew who melded his Jewish values with his secular obligations.

Eddie Goodman

On hearing of his death, Prime Minister Stephen Harper issued a statement. It said in part: "On behalf of all Canadians, I offer condolences to the family and friends of the Hon. Edwin (Eddie) Goodman, OC, PC, LL.D. Mr. Goodman dedicated his life to serving his country. His record of achievements, spanning over seven decades reflect the highest standards of patriotism and public service."

Harper noted that Eddie Goodman was a recipient of the Order of Canada, and continued, "Most recently, [former] prime minister [Brian] Mulroney appointed Mr. Goodman to the security intelligence review committee. Sworn into the Queen's Privy Council, this appointment reflected the trust Mr. Goodman earned as a decorated soldier in World War II and the many charitable and political roles he undertook with honour and determination."

The mosaic of Eddie Goodman's life will be remembered as one of overlapping interests and accomplishments that formed a unified composite.

In an interview in 1987 with The CJN, when he was the Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner honoree, he stated his credo, "Jews have a dual obligation. There is an obligation to stay with their roots in the Jewish community and to work in the Jewish community, but not to confine themselves or limit themselves only to the Jewish community. That's important to Canada and to our people."

His paternal grandfather, Charles, immigrated to Canada from Galicia in 1881 at the age of 11. Charles began working as a pedlar and brought his father and mother to Canada. Goodman's father, David, was born in Acton, Ont., in 1893 and graduated from Osgoode Hall Law School in 1917. He was one of the first graduates of the school.

Goodman's father was associated with E.W.J. Owens, a Conservative member of the Ontario legislature who politically influenced him and led the way for Goodman's long commitment and involvement with the Progressive Conservative Party. This association placed Goodman in a position in which he could help his country and the Jews in Canada as well as the State of Israel.

Goodman's childhood home was steeped in Zionism. Both his father and his mother, Dorothy, were actively involved in numerous Israeli causes. The Goodman home on Palmerston Boulevard was a busy place where Jewish organizations met and from which fundraising activities took place.

Goodman, who was born in 1918, and his sister, Cecily, both took on prominent community leadership roles on behalf of the State of Israel.

Eddie attended Clinton Public School and Harbord Collegiate Institute. His first involvement in the Jewish community was with Young Judaea when he was 12 years old. He also began his work for the Conservative party that year. He distributed pamphlets door to door for his father's friend Reg Geary, who later became a federal cabinet minister.

While Goodman was a law student at the University of Toronto, World War II broke out and his education was interrupted. He enlisted for active service in 1940 in the Canadian Army's Fort Gary Horse Armoured Regiment. He came to love horses during his service.

Promoted to major, he commanded a tank squadron in Normandy where he was wounded twice in action. He returned home a war hero.

Back in Toronto, Goodman resumed his education, graduating from Osgoode Hall in 1947. He then joined his father as an equal partner and the law firm that became Goodman & Goodman. In 1995, Goodman & Goodman joined with Phillips & Vineberg to form Goodman Phillips & Vineberg, now Goodman LLP.

Goodman entered politics in 1945, running unsuccessfully against Joseph (J.B.) Salsberg, the Communist candidate in Toronto's St. Andrews riding. Although he was asked many times after his defeat to enter the political arena, he chose to work for the Tories behind the scenes, at all levels of government.

As a backroom power broker, he became a confidant and adviser to the kingpins in politics. His skill in defusing confrontation brought him national recognition.

After an unsuccessful wartime marriage, which ended in 1951, he married Suzanne Gross in 1953. Gross' family was deeply involved in Jewish activities. As a couple, they were committed to volunteerism. Suzanne died in 1992, and in 1994, he married Joan Thompson.

Goodman and Suzanne had two daughters, Joanne and Dianne. Joanne was killed in a traffic accident in 1975 while driving, without a seatbelt, to the University of Western Ontario. This tragedy resulted in Goodman's lobbying for seatbelt legislation in Ontario.

While building his reputation as a corporate lawyer, he headed riding associations, moved up in the Conservative party, and established long and lasting friendships with PC party organizers, ambassadors, premiers and prime ministers.

Through his close associations with former prime ministers John Diefenbaker and Robert Stanfield and former Ontario premiers Leslie Frost and William Davis, and other policy-makers, he was able to bring attention to as well as support for Jewish causes.

He was dubbed "Fast Eddie" in 1967 when he was chairman of the Progressive Conservative convention at Maple Leaf Gardens. The nickname reflected his boundless energy and no-nonsense leadership.

His political leadership and acumen benefited many charitable causes. He co-chaired, with his longtime friend Ephraim Diamond, a highly successful campaign for Baycrest Hospital and contributed his efforts to other hospitals.

In the world of culture and the arts, his boundless energy was directed to the Royal Ontario Museum, where he served as chairman of the board of trustees.

He was a director and chairman of the sustaining fund campaign of the Shaw Festival at Niagara-on-the-Lake and a founding director and president of the National Ballet of Canada.

Goodman's involvement in corporate activities is legendary, and his list of clients reads like a who's who of Canadian business. He played a major role in raising money to found the Toronto Sun. He was chairman and honorary chairman of the committee for an independent Canada.

His honours were numerous. He was a past president of the General Wingate Branch of the Canadian Legion and received an honorary doctorate from the University of Ottawa.

For two years, he was a special lecturer in the department of political economy at U of T.

A risk taker, he had an insatiable appetite for adventure. He went on a horseback riding trip in Hungary, he went white-water canoeing in the Northwest Territories, mountain climbing in Nepal and fishing in the Arctic Ocean. Always physically active, he skied, played tennis and swam.

He took many adventure trips with his former law partner and longtime friend Lionel Schipper.

In 1998, to honour the 50th anniversary of Goodman's call to the bar, his friends and partners together with Schipper and his wife, Carol, established the Goodman-Schipper Chair at U of T's faculty of law.

He was eulogized at Holy Blossom Temple. He is survived by his wife, Joan, and her family, daughter Diane and husband Marc, two grandchildren, Myles and Ella, and sister Cecily Peters.

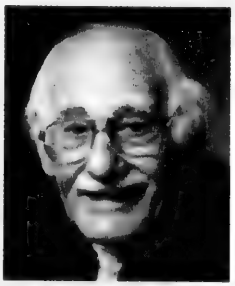
Leading Canadian composer dies at age 93

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

John Weinzweig, one of Canada's most celebrated composers, died last week at the age of 93.

Born to Polish-Jewish immigrants, Weinzweig made a name for himself composing scores for the CBC and the National Film Board and advocating for Canadian classical music.

"He was the individual who really established the infrastructure for composition to be a professional career in Canada," says Jason van Eyk, the Ontario regional director of the Canadian Music Centre, an institution Weinzweig started in 1959 to help promote Canadian composers.



John Weinzwig

Weinzweig's interest in music began when he was 14, when he picked up the mandolin and the piano. He later discovered the tuba, saxophone and bass, only to become a composer at 19.

In 1937, the Toronto-born musician studied at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester N.Y., which was only rivalled by the Juilliard School. It was here that he started to develop the modernist style that would define many of his compositions.

"When John went to Eastman, he studied two pieces that greatly influenced him," says van Eyk. "Stravinsky's The Rite Of Spring, and Alban Berg's Lyric Suite. The first influenced John through rhythmic innovation and the second was for its motivic and melodic developments."

When Weinzweig returned to Toronto a year later, he started teaching his new ideas at the Toronto Conservatory of Music (now the Royal Conservatory of Music). "He was a teacher to four generations of Canadian composers," says van Eyk, who cites Harry Somers, Harry Friedman and Murray Schafer as his pupils.

In 1953, the Canadian Jewish Congress commissioned Weinzweig to create a piece for the Jewish Music Festival. The result was Am Yisrael Chai.

"It's a very moving piece about Holocaust survivors who settled in Israel after independence and the war," says Ben Shek of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir. The choir played the piece at last weekend's Ashkenaz festival.

As revered as his music was, it was for his passion for Canadian classical music – and for the desire to get it heard – that Weinzweig really made his mark. "The dean of Canadian composers," as he was often called, started the Canadian League of Composers (CLC) in 1951, an influential organization that promoted Canadian musicians within the country and abroad.

"The CLC's purpose was to get Canadian music played throughout the world," says Sid Robinovitch, a Winnipeg-based composer. "And Weinzweig was a great spokesman. He was a very feisty guy and he was always very outspoken for the cause of Canadian music."

"He was really a firebrand," says van Eyk. "He felt passionately about being a composer and about being a musician. At his memorial service his son, Paul, said his father was a bit of an enigma and a paradox, and wasn't the easiest individual to understand. Sometimes those things that drive people are unclear to us but what was clear was his passion, his conviction and his ability to speak out."

Although Weinzweig's health started to deteriorate several years ago, his desire to get Canadian classical music heard never waned. Right up until his death, the legendary composer was trying to get the CBC to play more of it.

"In his final years, he would pull out his typewriter and write letters to the CBC," says van Eyk. "There are recordings of statements he sent to [be] played at meetings between CLC and CBC reps when they were having meetings, with things that he wanted to say. 'What's happening to the CBC,' he'd ask. 'Are they playing more Canadian composers now?' He did this up until his last moment. We took that message to heart and that's what we have to do, to continue to be a voice to have classical music put forward."

Numbers add up to a northern Israel emergency

Funds for UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign continue to rise

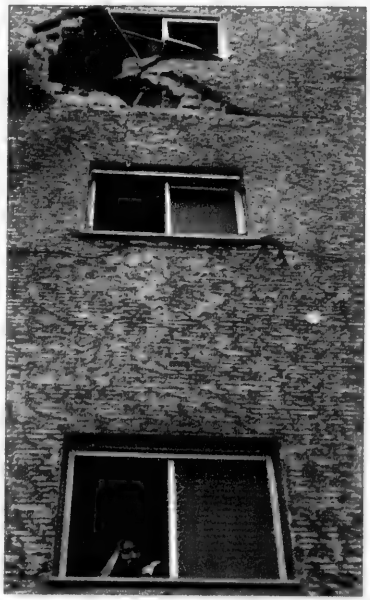
By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

The severe impact of Hezbollah rocket fire on northern Israel residents is intensifying at the same time as contributions to UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign continue to climb.

A quarter of northern Israel businesses could close, according to a report issued last week by Israel's Trade and Industry Ministry. Most of them earn the majority of their revenue in July and August. In addition, property damage claims – mostly in the north - to be paid by the Israeli government, will amount to the equivalent of nearly 1.3 billion Canadian dollars.

Northern hospitals and special centres dealt with nearly 3,000 cases of trauma caused by the storm of rockets raining down on the area. Forty one civilians were killed and more than 3,200 were wounded by rocket attacks.

In the aftermath of northern Israel coming to a standstill during the Hezbollah barrage of 4,000 rockets, many northern residents found themselves with nowhere to live or work. Schools, libraries, community centres, clinics, homes for the elderly, roads, bridges and agricultural land were heavily damaged. Northern tourism virtually stopped.



The UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign, chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks – to help relieve the anguish of northern Israel residents – has already raised $14 million for Israel's emergency needs, out of the campaign total to date. Donations are being sent to Israel on a regular basis, so the funds can quickly be put to work.

Contributions have so far financed, among other initiatives, summer camp during the war in central and southern Israel for children from the north, week-long get-aways for northern families, activities for kids in Bomb shelters, and emergency supplies for others.

The Israel Emergency Campaign will now fund urgently needed social service initiatives for northern Israel residents. Among them are:

- Trauma counselling
- Temporary housing for the uprooted
- Specialized care for the poor, new immigrants, the elderly and individuals with special needs and the restoration of social services for them
- Vocational training for the newly unemployed
- Re-equipping damaged community facilities
- A dedicated fund for victims and their families

To make a campaign contribution, visit www.ujadonations.com or call the UJA Federation campaign hotline at 416.631.5705.

Business owners face financial ruin

Jewish Agency steps in to help

METULLA - This picturesque town, on Israel's northern border, is normally catering to tourists in late summer, but for small business owners here, the war in the north and the toll of rocket attacks has brought them to financial disaster.

That's why the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation's overseas partner, is providing immediate emergency funds to help put small business owners back on their feet. This critical assistance will allow them to pay some of their most pressing bills, such as water, electricity and rent, and kick-start the painful task of rebuilding their businesses.

"July and August are, by far, the two busiest months in the tourist industry. We have lost 70% of our annual turnover," says Reuven Wineberg, owner of the Alaska Inn, which has been in his family for almost sixty years.

"My parents, Holocaust survivors established the hotel in the late 1940's. Times were tough then, but they worked very hard and managed go forward," Wineberg recalls. When they passed away, Wineberg took over the business.

Wineberg was injured while serving in the Israeli army during the first Lebanese war and still walks with a limp. His late father-in-law, Eitan Grundland, was killed when an Iraqi-fired Scud missile hit his home in the center of Israel during the Gulf War.

For Reuven and his late parents, the hotel is a symbol of their determination to live a normal life within their own country.

"I won't be leaving, despite the heavy losses we will incur this year," says Wineberg. "I don't know how we will survive it, but we will," he says.

Just northwest of Metulla lie the beautiful orchards farmed by the Bez family. Their fruits - pears, apricots, cherries, plums, peaches, nectarines and apples - are well known in Israel and around the world for their excellent taste.

Ophir Bez has been running the family's 25-acre orchards since his father retired six years ago. "Our activities for the entire year are focused around the harvest season, which fell exactly when the war broke out," he explains. "All our time and money spent in bringing the fruit to its maximum has been for nothing. We were not able to go to the orchards and the fruit is just rotting in the fields."

The day that the cease fire took effect, Bez put a crew together to pick some of his finest plums, which he had personally nurtured. "They were already too ripe, and had very little market value, but I wanted to show the Hezbollah that the Israeli people will not be beaten," he says.

Erez Shemesh was shocked when he returned to Kiryat Shmona where he was born and raised, to see his beauty salon in ruins. "I have to start completely over," says Shemesh. "I don't know where to begin." Despite his tremendous losses, he is adamant that he will not leave. "This is where my home and family are," adds Shemesh. "This is where I belong."

Canadian facilities survive rocket attacks

Canadian projects in northern Israel not only escaped direct hits by terrorist rockets, they also provided temporary housing for Israeli soldiers.

The Tel Hai Posluns Family Youth Hostel and Guest House in the Upper Galilee was closed to regular guests with the outbreak of war and started providing important services to military personnel serving in the region. While the maximum capacity of the facility is 279 beds, there were 400 soldiers sleeping there in beds, mattresses on floors, in classrooms and other areas.

Twelve of the soldiers staying at Tel Hai were killed by a single Hezbollah rocket on August 6, near the entrance to the Kibbutz Kfar Giladi cemetery. Twelve others were injured. An impromptu memorial was set up at the site where the 12 soldiers were killed, with candles, the Israel flag, and letters of condolence. Nurit Biderman, who represents UIA Federations Canada in the Galilee Panhandle, reports that she recently saw a soldier in civilian clothes, his weapon on his shoulder, visiting the memorial site together with his parents. The soldier, among the fortunate who survived the deadly bombing, was showing his parents exactly where he had been standing at the time of the katyusha attack.

The Canada Centre in Metulla on Israel's border with Lebanon, which was closed to the general public, opened its doors to some 600 soldiers who were able to sleep and shower there, and eat their meals in pleasant, comfortable surroundings, rather than outdoors, under katyusha rocket fire, in the terrible heat of the Israeli summer.

A few days into the war a rocket landed on the road outside the eastern wing of the Phil Granovsky Family Cultural Hall in Kiryat Shmona, causing four large glass windows to shatter with some damage to blinds and doors. Luckily the facility was closed – with the outbreak of war on July 12 - and no residents were on their way to the building.

Jann Arden headlines synagogue fundraiser

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

With a major fundraising concert this fall featuring Juno-award-winning artist Jann Arden, Beth Torah Congregation is on its way to realizing its goal of expanding and renovating its building.

Arden will perform at the shul's Completing the Dream Gala, to be held Nov. 1 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The shul's fundraising campaign has already raised $2.9 million of its $4 million target.

Currently, the synagogue, which is located off Dufferin Street south of Lawrence Avenue, has a combined sanctuary and social hall. The renovation and expansion will include a larger sanctuary and a separate social hall, as well as upgraded facilities and a new and better kitchen.

After the renovations are done, the shul will be able to accommodate 500 member families.

The general public is welcome to purchase a ticket for the gala event for a donation of $250, said campaign co-chair David Glick.

He said the decision to enlist Arden in the gala was easy. "She's just a great entertainer and a good draw and people would like to see her."

Glick, whose parents were founding members of the congregation, said longstanding plans to expand the 41-year-old synagogue building had been put on hold until close to two years ago, when a synagogue member died and left $1 million to the shul.

"We met with the executor, his brother, and proposed a possibility for expansion and renovation," Glick said.

He added that the expansion is necessary, as there is a high demand for membership. The synagogue has approximately 430 member families. In June, 100 families on a waiting list were offered membership, and 40 joined.

"People on the waiting list that have joined this year will be treated to a [High Holy Day] service [at nearby Villa Colombo]," he said. "We'll hire a new rabbi and cantor just for the families, until the new building is built and then they'll join us."

Construction is slated to begin in May 2007 and is expected to take two years to complete.

Naming rights opportunities are available to congregants and non-members, starting at $1,800.

For more information on other sponsorship opportunities, visit the shul's website at www.bethtorah.ca, or call 416-782-4495 ext. 41.

'UN has remained passive in the face of Hezbollah provocations'

A spokesperson for Annan denied UNIFIL provided Hezbollah with any useful military information.

Responding to a reporter's question at a press briefing in New York last week, Stéphane Dujarric said "UNIFIL was performing its observer role.

"The press releases that came out included no items that could be construed as military intelligence. Numbers of troops were not published. UNIFIL reported names of areas occupied by Israeli forces inside Lebanon during the conflict and those vacated by Israel after Resolution 1701 came into effect. It also consistently reported on the presence of Hezbollah fighters, whenever those fighters were positioned near UNIFIL positions.

"To make clear, UNIFIL has never received one complaint from the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) for the press releases it issued."

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, said evidence presented in a recent article in the Washington-based Weekly Standard suggests UNIFIL was not the neutral observer it claims to be.

The article, "What did you do in the war UNIFIL?" by Lori Lowenthal Marcus, claims the UN peacekeeping force "openly published daily real-time intelligence, of obvious usefulness to Hezbollah, on the location, equipment and force structure of Israeli troops in Lebanon."

Lowenthal Marcus states that UNIFIL used its website to post the specific placement of IDF safety structures within hours of construction, as well as troop movements and weaponry, while posting "not a single item of specific intelligence regarding Hezbollah forces."

She quotes a July 25 UNIFIL posting that says: "Yesterday and during last night, the IDF moved significant reinforcements, including a number of tanks, armoured personnel carriers, bulldozers and infantry, to the area of Al Ras inside Lebanese territory. The IDF advanced from that area north toward Bint Jubayl and south towards Yarun."

The article quotes a number of unnamed Israeli military and political representatives and analysts saying some of the UNIFIL information could have exposed Israeli soldiers to "grave danger."

Neuer said if the allegations are true, it would not mark a major departure from previous UNIFIL one-sidedness. He noted that in 2000, Hezbollah operatives, wearing UNIFIL insignia and using UNIFIL-marked trucks, kidnapped three Israeli soldiers from inside Israel. UNIFIL soldiers taped the incident and for nine months denied they had a video of the incident. Later they admitted they did, but they refused to aid in Israel's investigation of the kidnapping (and subsequent murder) of the soldiers.

"Given that history, when we saw that [Weekly Standard] report we immediately spoke out, protested and demanded an investigation," Neuer said.

Neuer suggested the UN has remained passive in the face of Hezbollah provocations because of intimidation.

"I think there is a cultural problem. There is no question that Hezbollah is a murderous terrorist group. They have intimidated with their terrorism – the same as Mussolini and Hitler – and everybody in Lebanon is intimidated.

"I expect that the rather passive UN soldiers know you don't cross Hezbollah, whereas the IDF is fair game."

Neuer was moderately hopeful a beefed-up UNIFIL presence will limit Hezbollah's influence. Even though UNIFIL has declared it will not disarm the terrorist group as required by UN resolutions, its presence will push Hezbollah from the border with Israel and Hezbollah will likely not carry arms openly.

"It's a diminishment of Hezbollah," he suggested.

UN Watch is a privately funded organization founded in 1993 by a former American ambassador to the United Nations, Morris Abram. It is affiliated with the American Jewish Committee.

MP modifies war-crime accusation against Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Bloc Quebecois MP Maria Mourani quickly backtracked from accusing Israel of committing war crimes in Lebanon during its assault on Hezbollah.

In a front-page interview published in Le Devoir Aug. 30, Mourani said she was deeply troubled by the destruction she had seen during a week-long visit to Lebanon organized for Canadian parliamentarians by the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations earlier that month.

"It's clear to me, what I saw, what Amnesty International saw, what Louise Arbour [United Nations high commissioner for human rights] saw, is that there were war crimes in Lebanon," she is quoted as saying. Asked who committed these crimes, she responded "the Israelis."

The next day, Mourani issued a statement that, "It's up to the duly mandated international authorities to define what constitutes a war crime and to describe one or the other of the parties involved a war criminal in an armed conflict."

She also said the United Nations is best placed to conduct such an inquiry and "draw the appropriate conclusions."

Mourani added that she "totally supports the balanced position adopted by the Bloc Quebecois since the beginning of the conflict" which is that "the kidnappings, the missile attacks on civilian populations as well as the bombardment of towns are reprehensible acts."

In the Le Devoir articles, she elaborated that she found numerous unexploded cluster bombs and evidence of "deliberate" shelling of civilian areas, including homes and businesses.

"They (also) targeted the vital civilian structures like water, electricity, food stations. That's also war crimes, according to international law."

She expressed doubt about the Israeli claim that the bombardment of the village of Qana was accidental. "They said they bombed Qana because they had seen trucks with arms returning to a space in a garage. I saw none of that. I rummaged, I searched the famous garage. There were only little houses one next to the other with farmyards."

Mourani, MP for the Montreal riding of Ahuntsic, holds dual Lebanese-Canadian citizenship, but was born in Ivory Coast and was only in Lebanon once before at the age of 2.

She was accompanied on the Lebanon trip by Liberal Borys Wrzesnewskyj and New Democrat Peggy Nash. Unlike the two Ontario opposition MPs, Mourani had been more cautious in her comments about Hezbollah. She had affirmed while in Lebanon the Canadian government's position that Hezbollah is a terrorist organization.

In her Aug. 31 clarifying statement, Mourani said she is in agreement with Arbour's "nuanced" position that it is possible war crimes were committed by both Israel and Hezbollah during the conflict.

Meanwhile, the Canada-Israel Committee expressed regret at the death of Bloc MP Benoit Sauvageau who was killed in a traffic accident last week.

CIC chair Marc Gold described the Repentigny MP as "a real friend" of the Jewish community.

Sauvageau visited Israel two years ago on a CIC-sponsored trip for parliamentarians and young Jewish leaders.

"We got to know each other quite well, and became friendly afterward, meeting for lunch and speaking on the phone," said Gold.

"We were not in agreement on every domestic or Israeli policy, but you could always count on Benoit to be open and receptive, and to do the right and decent thing."

Hair: Maurice Fiorio tells us that this season, hair trends fall into rich chocolate browns and reds in warm vibrant tones, autumn shades and colours.

Long hair is still very in, but short, sassy and sleek styles are predominant – going back to straight and polished. Curls are tamed down using straightening balms and thermal creams or sprays to help to achieve and maintain the look while protecting the hair from heat generated by blow dryers, curling irons and straightening irons. Texture is voluminous and full of body.

Redken introduces new Clear Moisture Instant Polishing Prep, a leave-in cutting and detangling lotion that provides lightweight moisture and manageability for normal to dry hair. It helps to restore, rebalance and retain the optimum level of moisture for easy combing and smoothness so that hair is replenished, weightless and polished.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

Concealer, Foundation and Powder: You have treated your skin, and now it's time to prime the canvas. The first step in applying foundation is to use a proper colour concealer to cover dark circles, broken capillaries or redness on the skin. Make sure to apply the concealer over all areas and pat them. The final steps are to apply the foundation over the entire face and then gently pat over the concealer with your fingertips.

Vital Radiance introduces Corrector for Redness and Dark Circles, a green formula that neutralizes red blemishes and broken capillaries; a yellow formula that neutralizes purple or blue discolouration around the eyes; and Mother of Pearl, Rose Quartz and Topaz that brighten naturally. Along with this wonderful product is the Age Spot Concealer which is lightweight and has an SPF15. This product conceals age and sun spots on the face and hands and won't settle in the lines or pores.

Vital Radiance also has Smoothing Face Primer, a lightweight oil-free formula with an SPF25. This primer moisturizes and diffuses to make the skin look flawless, fills in the lines and evens out the skin tone, which prevents makeup from settling in the lines. Be sure to finish off your foundation with a setting powder.

Lise Watier unveils Poudre Barocco, a trio of beige hues that lead us into fall's softer light, after the summer's high beam. This beautiful metal compact is made of gold matte arabesque motifs and is a must to have in your makeup collection.

It takes great makeup to achieve that no makeup look. The key is to find the right foundation shade, finish and coverage. Chanel has created Teint Innocence Naturally Luminous Fluid Makeup, a lightweight formula for a fresh, natural complexion that's designed to restore the youthful look of radiance and softness. The formula contains vitamins B5, E and F to hydrate and protect the skin.

Estée Lauder pesents Double Wear Stay-in-Place Foundation. This wonderful product gives you an even-toned, luminous, flawless-looking skin in a long-wearing transfer-resistant foundation that's as comfortable as it is effective.

Lancôme introduces a multi-dimensional matte makeup – Magique Matte, a perfecting makeup with a light mousse texture that transforms into a soft-matte, velvety powder finish. The foundation is available in 10 shades with five hues that cover different skin for women of all ethnicities.

Eyes: Rich new shades are hot for this season. The focus is natural and earthy, but vibrant colours have returned. Colours to look for are deep plums, smoky blues and grays, eggplant and shades of purple. The smoky look for eyes is back. Use a dark grey shadow to line the eyes, rather than a black liner. When using a few colours on the lid, remember to blend, blend, blend. Gel eyeliner is hot! Make sure to maximize your lashes with a lengthening mascara to define your eyes.

Estée Lauder brings you New Pure Colour Eye Shadow, a dramatically improved formula that results in long wear, more intense colour and improved blendability. This beautiful, crystal clear compact includes a mirror and applicator for easy application. There are six exciting new colour families with 30 shades of high impact colour.

A guide to dress codes

By ELLEN LECHTER GREEN

Recently, journalist Lisa Lester of Ottawa received an invitation in the mail to a family bar mitzvah evening party in October. In small writing on the bottom were the words "funky formal." Perplexed, she did what any self-respecting journalist would do under these circumstances. She called on friends who seemed most up-to-date on fashion trends.

"Maybe I'm not that hip when it comes to understanding dress codes, but I discovered that I'm not alone," says Lester. "I spoke to three friends, and they all had their own interpretation of what should be worn to a 'funky formal' event."

According to Lester, that advice ranged from cocktail-length dresses and skirts to stylish pants with a blouse or jacket. The unanimous consensus was absolutely no jeans.

Steven, Susan, Carly and Seth Mitchell of Montreal are dressed in formal attire.

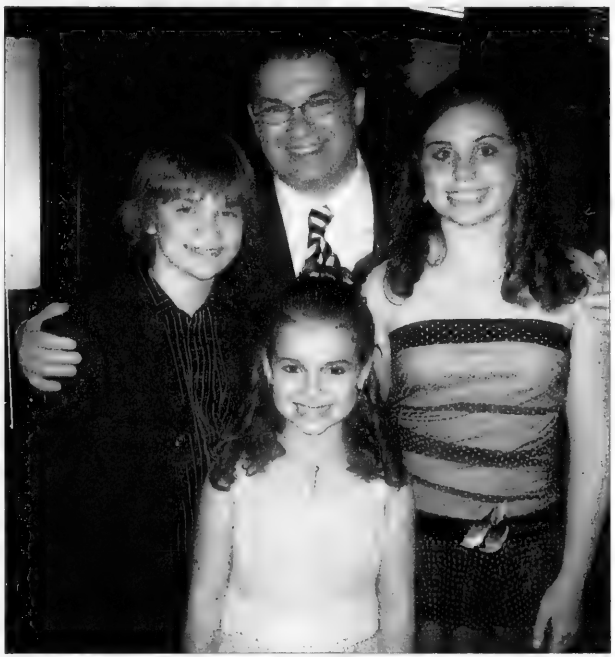
"Funky chic, clubwear, or funky formal basically all mean that you don't have to wear a long gown or tuxedo, but you're expected to dress nicely and appropriately for the event," says Carole Werner, who has been an invitation agent for Canadian and American fashion lines for 18 years.

"I prefer including more traditional dress codes on an invitation, particularly those that most people are familiar with. This helps avoid any confusion."

Most people recognize and understand attire expectations when they are indicated as being black tie, formal, semiformal or black tie optional, she says.

"Semiformal or cocktail attire usually means the same thing. Men wear suits and ties and ladies wear dresses or skirts but no long gowns."

Formal, black tie and black tie optional usually indicate either suits and ties or tuxedos for men, gowns or formal dresses for women.



Anthony Wolfe with kids Molly and Russell and niece Hailey dressed for a black-tie-optional event.

Werner advises her clients to be clear on dress-code expectations for both adults and children. "You want your guests showing up dressed appropriately for your event," she says. "That's the whole point of including a dress code on the invitation."

As well, often your invitation is going to guests who live outside your city. And each community may have its own interpretation of understanding various dress codes.

As for Lester, she decided to call her cousin who was planning the bar mitzvah party to establish once and for all the meaning of funky formal.

"It's a good thing I called because the affair is being held in a hotel in Montreal, and I thought it would be fine to wear a nice pair of pants," she says. "But my cousin told me that she expects funky formal to mean the same thing as formal attire. That means that dress pants are out for me."

Interestingly enough, she adds, her cousin also complained that Lester's phone call was actually one of several that she received from people who didn't understand the dress code.

Here are basic interpretations of dress codes:

- Black tie: formal attire with men in tuxedos, and women in cocktail, long dresses or evening separates.
- White tie: ultra-formal. Men are in white tie, vest and shirt, while women are in long gowns.
- Formal or black tie optional: usually means the same as black tie, but men can wear suits and ties with the option of tuxedos. Women wear cocktail, long dresses or dressy eveningwear.
- Semiformal, funky formal and cocktail attire: tuxedos are not required, nor are long dresses. An evening affair means dark suits with a tie for men and a cocktail dress for her. Daytime semiformal events mean a suit for him and a shorter dress or suit for women.
- Dressy casual, funky chic, clubwear: no jeans or shorts.
- Casual or denim to diamonds generally means anything goes.

Fall Fashion & Beauty

The shape of things

By RANDI BERGMAN

It happens every year. The playful summer disappears into the back-to-books nature of fall and we are yet again thrust into winterland. Without getting too morose, it's important to note that among many other things, fall is the time to make a serious fashion statement. And this year that statement is hardly about trends.

What's proving to be more revolutionary than any trend out there is the topsy-turvy silhouette of the season. And for an industry obsessed with size, this is quite the revolutionary step indeed. At a time when bubble dresses and pencil skirts are simultaneously stylish, it is clear that nothing is more fashionable than pushing the boundary with size.

With this change in proportion, you can have your cake and eat it too. Big on top, skin tight on the bottom and vice versa... that effervescent sense of "anything goes" can be translated into every look of the season.

The bubble dress is the perfect embodiment of the voluminous end of the spectrum. In an ode to the house's original 1960s creations, Nicholas Ghesquière has brought the bubble back with a vengeance for Balenciaga. And as any fashionable lady would know, whatever Nicholas says goes. The bubble has been brought to a mall near you in the form of swing jackets and poofy skirts, and can even be created by belting a voluminous dress.

On the other side of the spectrum is the rake-thin silhouette. The look has been runway-ized over the past few seasons in the form of modish mini-dresses and skinny suits by the likes of Dior and Rochas and is back in full force for fall. More prominent on the bottom half of the body, the skin-tight look is simply achieved by throwing on a pair of those good ol' leggings you've been donning for the last year.

But what's groundbreaking about these new proportions is not what they look like individually. Rather, the combination of wearing the two together is what makes this fashion statement so chic and modern. Layering a big dress over patterned tights will gain you real street cred among the impossibly fashionable.

Proportions have been on the move for years. It's the height of the size revolution... don't be caught dead in a plain Jane jeans and T-shirt combo. With the topsy-turvy look dominating runways from Paris to New York, it's clear that proportion is the thing to change in your wardrobe this year.

Cruise ship's beautifully refurbished spa pampers

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Often during a spa treatment your body feels afloat. At the Greenhouse Spa & Salon on Holland America Line's ms Maasdam, your esthetic treatment is truly an uplifting experience – literally.

During a day at the spa in one of the treatment rooms, you can pass a number of different landmarks with spectacular views. This summer, guests were pampered at the spa facility while cruising New England and eastern Canada during seven-day sojourns to and from Boston and Montreal.

The ms Maasdam is Holland America Line's 12th ship to be refurbished with and enhanced, which includes a number of upgrades to both staterooms and throughout the ship, including the spa. The ship came out of dry dock in April 2006 with an expanded, state-of-the-art spa and fitness centre.

The spa has nine treatment rooms with picture windows. These rooms have beige marble countertops, teak cupboards with brass fittings. The walls are painted green beige and there are gold brocade curtains.

"One of the rooms has a dry float bed in it," says spa manager Dawn Sparks, who hails from Vancouver. "You sink into the bed, it is warm and you feel like you are floating on air.

It is wonderful for sore, achy joints and bones. We have a relaxation room done in blue colours with calming wicker chaise longues to lie in while sipping fruit juices or water.

"Also in the room is an alpha capsule. It looks like a big egg. You lie in it. It has variable vibration and aromatherapy oils. Relaxing music is piped in, which takes you into a deep meditative state."

Sparks favourite room is the Thermal Suite. The walls are tiled in blue, aqua and white mosaics to resemble the sea. There are five heated chaise longues made from aqua mosaic tiles, which relieve sore and tense muscles. The room features two tiled steam rooms with essential oil steams, two aromatic massage rain showers and a Jacuzzi tub.

In the spa is a hair and barbering area where teeth whitening is offered. The fitness centre has six treadmills, each with a television set, two step machines and recumbent, regular and spinning bicycles. There's a nominal fee for Pilates, yoga, spinning and kickboxing classes.

The spa staff of 10 includes one fitness instructor, two hair stylists, one nail technician and seven massage and beauty therapists. They come from all over the world.

"The main signature treatments that we have are our Ionathermie Detoxification Treatment, which is an anti-cellulite treatment for inch loss," says Sparks.

"We have the Aromaspa Ocean Wrap, which is a seaweed and mud body mask done with or without massage. The La Thérapie Hydralift Facial is an anti-aging corrective skin-care treatment using galvanic stimuli and anti-bacterial ozone wand.

"We also have a Japanese Silk Boaster Facial that uses an actual mask made of silk that is impregnated with pro-collagen serums to decrease fine lines and wrinkles and to improve elasticity in the skin," she says.

Other services include hot stones for chakra balancing, manicure and pedicures, and an array of massages and facials.

The product lines that are exclusive to the Greenhouse Spa & Salon include the skin and body line Elemis from England, La Thérapie corrective products from France and the new Time for Men line with a full range of products.

There are a number of spa packages offered, the most popular being Design Your Own Indulgence. Guests, with the help of staff, pick the treatments they require or desire. Treatment times, especially on cruising days, book up quickly, so you may consider booking a package before your trip or on the first day of the cruise. During the first two days of your cruise, you will receive a $20 discount on all Signature treatments.

To book your Holland America Line cruise and spa treatments aboard the ms Maasdam, which includes 2006-07 cruises to New England and eastern Canada, Europe and this winter, the Caribbean, call 1-877-SAIL HAL or visit www.hollandamerica.com. Inspectors: Iran not cooperating

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The final, absolute, no-question deadline passed, Iran still won't give in and the world is finally ready to wait and see.

The International Atomic Energy Agency report, delivered last week to the UN Security Council, erases any last vestige of doubt that Iran might accede to international demands to stop enriching uranium, diplomats said.

"The IAEA is still unable to confirm the peaceful nature of Iran's nuclear program," said John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. "Now, in the language of the IAEA and the international system, that's a red flag. That says that the Iranian program contains much that should be worried about here in New York, and that I think underlies our concern that Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons."

The report was hardly unexpected. Iran's self-set deadline to respond to the sanctions or assistance offer from the international community had been Aug. 22, and its answer, delivered that day to diplomats, was to call for more negotiations.

Jon Alterman, director of the Middle East program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said the process was still very much under way, deadlines or no.

"This has a long way to play out," he said. "The United States will go to the Security Council and see what progress it can get. It will threaten the Security Council, in subtle or blunt ways: 'If you don't act, we will.'"

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, claimed – just hours before the IAEA report was published – that enriching uranium was Iran's "right." Iranian officials later called the IAEA report "baseless."

The Aug. 22 deadline came after two other deadlines set by the United States passed in July. A host of earlier ultimatums has come and gone since 2003, when the international community first tried to corner Iran on the issue.

Iran insists its program is peaceful, but IAEA inspectors say that's doubtful, and that the nature of the uranium enrichment suggests a weapons program.

So what happens now?

Bolton made clear that he expects the next step to be sanctions; after all, that was what the five permanent, veto-wielding members of the Security Council, plus Germany, threatened earlier this year in making Iran the offer first outlined by Britain, France and Germany, known as the "E.U.-3."

Russia and China committed to seeking sanctions when the group met about two months ago, Bolton said.

Their statement was clear "that if Iran continued to reject the very generous offer that the E.U.-3 were making on behalf of the six countries and if Iran failed to suspend its uranium enrichment activities, now as called for both by the International Atomic Energy Agency and by the Security Council, then the Perm-5 plus Germany would come to the Security Council and seek sanctions," he said.

Well, maybe – Russian and Chinese diplomats were notably silent after the IAEA report was delivered.

Even the European nations, which have been firmer in threatening sanctions, were hanging back until they heard more from the Iranians.

Javier Solana, the European Union foreign policy chief, was set to discuss next steps next week with Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator. Iranian diplomats were readying for a diplomatic blitz to Russia, China and European capitals next week.

Shi'ite Iran also may try to use its considerable conventional force to cow Sunni Arab neighbours into blocking international sanctions, according to a report released this month by the London-based Chatham House, the Royal Institute of International Affairs.

"The Sunni Arab states of Jordan, Egypt and the Gulf are wary of Iran yet feel compelled by its strength to maintain largely cordial relations while Iran embarrasses their Western-leaning governments through its stance against the United States," said the report on Iran's burgeoning regional influence.

The lack of international backing is unlikely to dampen determination in Washington to isolate Iran. The top agenda item for U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) for the last congressional session in September, before mid-term elections, is final passage of her Iran Freedom Act, which has garnered overwhelming support in the House of Representatives.

The American Israel Public Affairs Committee and an array of other Jewish groups are committed to the act's passage. The legislation would considerably toughen existing U.S. sanctions against Iran, extending them to third parties that deal with Iran, a measure that would increase Iran's isolation even without formal support from China, Russia and the Europeans.

Ultimately, the world might have to learn to live with a nuclear Iran, said Shlomo Aronson, a political science professor at Hebrew University of Jerusalem. That might be tolerable for a while, as long as Iran maintains the opacity it has cultivated until now, he said.

"They will not threaten the use of a nuclear weapon that they deny exists," he said.

The problem with that scenario, Alterman said, is that even the tacit threat of a nuclear Iran poses dangers.

"A nuclear Iran is not a more confident, self-contained Iran," Alterman said. "It's an Iran that is likelier to seek a regional war at the expense of the United States and at the expense of Israeli security. An Iran throwing its weight around is not going to be on the side of the angels."

Shalit's kidnappers said to want 1,000 prisoners freed

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Egyptian officials have told their Israeli counterparts in recent days that in exchange for the release of 500 Palestinian female and juvenile prisoners, the kidnappers of Cpl. Gilad Shalit would be willing to release the IDF soldier to Egyptian custody, the Jerusalem Post has learned.

Two officers from Egyptian intelligence are currently stationed in the Gaza Strip and are said to be in touch with the actual kidnappers, who have passed on to them their demands.

Following the release of the first 500 prisoners and Shalit, the kidnappers are also demanding the release of an additional 500 Hamas members being held in Israeli prisons. This was the first time that an exact number of prisoners demanded by the kidnappers was stipulated in talks over the release of Shalit.

The Post has learned that Israel is holding up the deal, and Egypt is waiting for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's response.

"The Egyptians are keeping their line of communication with the kidnappers open on a low flame," one source said. "The plan is in place. All Israel needs to do is answer the request."

The official government stance has been that Israel refuses to negotiate the return of Shalit so as not to encourage the kidnapping of additional IDF soldiers.

Israel wants international troops at Syria/Lebanon border

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel is calling for deployment of international troops at nine Lebanese border crossings where Hezbollah is attempting to smuggle truck-laden missiles from Syria, a senior adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said last week.

Miri Eisen said Israel has raised the issue of arms smuggling with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, who visited the region last week. "It's being discussed...We say to the United Nations and Kofi Annan that this issue is not being dealt with." she said.

In a telephone interview from Israel, Eisen laid out Israel's case that Hezbollah must be prevented from re-arming – particularly through overland routes from Syria.

Hezbollah has been repeatedly violating UN resolution 1701, which calls for its disarmament and which embargoes new weapons to the Lebanese group, she said. Because of the success of Israel's blockade of Lebanese ports and airfields, Hezbollah has turned to an overland route for arms replenishment.

Eisen said Israel is concerned that Hezbollah is attempting to smuggle Katyusha missiles on trucks through the border crossings, as well as suitcase-sized anti-tank missiles.

Miri Eisen

Iran is the source of the trucked missiles and Syria the anti-tank munitions, she said. The missiles are being shipped overland from Iran, through Turkey and Syria to Lebanon. Thousands of trucks enter Turkey from Iran each day, mostly bound for Europe, and Turkish authorities cannot search each one. Those destined for Lebanon then traverse Syria.

"Syria and Lebanon have a 330-km long border which has no fence," she said. The trucks can enter Lebanon through any of the nine border crossings. "We have evidence they are trying."

Eisen would not indicate if Israel was interdicting the shipments, saying, "Israel reserves as always the right to self defense."

Eisen's comments came as Israel tried to draw international attention to Hezbollah's repeated attempts to rearm in violation of UN resolution 1701 and to Iran's and Syria's roles in providing munitions to the Islamic terrorist group. She said Israel's successful embargo on Lebanese ports and airfields will continue until international troops take over. She called for an international presence on the Lebanese border with Syria as well.

Eisen noted that Israeli intelligence had learned that Syria provided Hezbollah with sophisticated Russian-made anti-tank missiles that were used extensively in the Lebanon war. "The short-range anti-tank missiles had a devastating effect on the troops and it is difficult to give protection against it," she said. "They fired a couple of hundred anti-tank missiles and hit around 25 different targets."

(Globes Online, an Israeli business website, reported that 52 tanks were hit by Cornet, Concourse and Metis-M missiles. Of that number 22 were penetrated by missiles and 23 soldiers killed.)

Eisen said the anti-tank missiles have been traced back to Syria. Cyrillic writing on some of the missiles indicate they originated in Russia and were supplied to Syrian forces.

In a related development Israeli Foreign Minister Tsipi Livni asked the United Nations to adopt a resolution preventing Iran from arming Hezbollah. She also called on the international community to pressure Lebanon to release two Israeli soldiers, whose kidnapping triggered the month long war.

Learning the lessons of the Katyusha war

By UZI RUBIN
Jerusalem Post

Between July 13 and August 13, the Israel Police reported 4,228 strikes by Hezbollah rockets in the North. No area in the world has suffered so many rocket impacts since the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s.

The great majority of the rockets were supplied by Syria rather than by Iran. Most of the warheads contained anti-personnel munitions – a mixture of explosives and steel balls or fragments designed to kill anybody near the impact site.

Nearly a quarter – 23 per cent – of the rockets that landed in Israel hit built-up areas. During the first two weeks, rocket attacks averaged about 100 per day. In early August, Hezbollah doubled its rate of fire to a daily average of 200 attacks. There was a decline during the final week, but on August 13, the day before the cease-fire, 250 rockets landed in Israel.

At one point, Hezbollah was able to fire approximately 150 rockets in an hour.

Approximately 250 longer-range rockets (50+ kilometres) were fired at Israel.

Israeli counter-attacks apparently had no significant affect on Hezbollah's rate of fire, but they did succeed in reducing the accuracy and altering the geography of the attacks.

Israel's losses from the rockets included 53 killed, 250 seriously wounded and 2,000 lightly wounded. There was also extensive damage to hundreds of dwellings, several public utility facilities and dozens of industrial plants. One million Israelis stayed near or in public shelters or protected rooms, with some 250,000 relocating to other areas of the country. Most economic activity in northern Israel was suspended for a month. Warning sirens saved innumerable lives. The long-standing policy of constructing public shelters, combined with building codes that require reinforced spaces in private dwellings, proved to be a generally effective passive defence system. Nearly 80 per cent – 41 out of 53 – of fatalities involved people caught in the open.

Rockets and rocket launchers emerged as one of the defining weapons of the second Lebanon War and will impact on the security of United States and Western interests in the Middle East for the foreseeable future. Effective counter-measures must be devised and deployed as soon as possible. Two objectives should be pursued: first, to reduce the "Flash to Bang" (Hezbollah rocket launch to Israeli response) cycle time to a few seconds from the time the launcher's location is pinpointed; and second, to provide an effective and affordable active defence against rockets at vital civilian and military installations. On July 12, Hezbollah gunmen crossed the border and set an ambush, killing three IDF soldiers and kidnapping two. Five more soldiers were killed after the army crossed into Lebanon in pursuit. The following morning, Hezbollah fired a Katyusha rocket that hit the main street in Nahariya, killing one woman and wounding at least 10.

When the decision was made to respond in force to the attacks, it was taken into consideration that Hezbollah would almost certainly fire numerous rockets at northern Israel.

The head of IDF Military Intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin, told the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee on August 24 that, with the exception of the long-range Iranian Zelzal missiles, most projectiles fired by Hezbollah came from the Syrian arsenal rather than from Iran. However, the remains of an Iranian-made 240-millimetre Fajr-3 missile, which has a range of 45 kilometres, have also been identified.

Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz told the foreign affairs and defence committee on August 16 that Israel had been "successful in destroying 90 per cent of [Hezbollah's] long-range rockets."

On July 14, Hezbollah attacked the INS Hanit with a Noor (C802) anti-ship missile, killing four sailors. In addition, Israel Radio reported that at least one Hezbollah unmanned aerial vehicle downed by the Israel Air Force carried a 30-kilogram bomb, in the first recorded use of UAVs as an air-to-surface cruise missile.

A home in Haifa damaged by rocket fire during the early days of the war. [Israel]

In August, Hezbollah changed its tactics, firing more rockets at the same target, in part in an effort to kill people emerging from shelters after they believed it was safe.

Most rockets were tracked by early warning systems, which helped to identify launch sites. Counter-fire by artillery was only marginally effective, as were raids by special forces units on rocket launchers and command posts.

IAF strikes were moderately effective in reducing the accuracy of the rocket fire and forcing the launchers out of the areas in optimal range of Haifa. Thus, downtown Haifa was not hit during the later stage of the conflict, except on the last day, when Hezbollah made a special effort to this end.

Controversial authors at it again

WASHINGTON — The "Israel Lobby, The Sequel" is officially on the road, and it's forcing the Jewish community to reassess the two professors peddling its story of Washington in the grip of nefarious pro-Israel lobbyists.

In an address last week in Washington hosted by the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), Stephen Walt and John Mearsheimer expanded their original thesis of an excessively influential Israel lobby by addressing the reaction to their March paper, The Israel Lobby, and assessing its theories in the wake of the Lebanon war.

The result was clarity: there no longer is any doubt about what drove the two academics, critics of the original paper say.

"It'll be much easier now to deal with them and their arguments," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League. "They're not academics – they're handmaidens of the Arab propaganda machine."

CAIR and Mearsheimer did not return requests for comment.

The most damning criticism of the original paper was that it made assertions not backed by evidence. Yet instead of retreating from their critique, Mearsheimer and Walt seemed to revel in it.

Not only had Israel long planned its war this summer against Hezbollah in Lebanon, Mearsheimer claimed, but it did so with the connivance of the Bush administration.

"It now seems clear that Israel had been planning to strike at Hezbollah for months before the July 12 kidnapping" of two Israeli soldiers "and that key Israelis had briefed the administration about their intentions," Mearsheimer said. "The available evidence indicates that the Bush administration enthusiastically endorsed Israel's plans for war in Lebanon."

No serious researcher has made this claim. New Yorker investigative journalist Seymour Hersh and others have reported on Israeli contingency plans and how senior Israeli officials believed a confrontation was inevitable because of Hezbollah's missile buildup in southern Lebanon, but the argument that Israel was seeking a pretext to attack – and that the United States "enthusiastically" endorsed it – seems to be Mearsheimer's alone.

Asked to present evidence, Mearsheimer cited articles quoting Israel's "understandable" fears of a missile buildup, but failed to cite evidence of a search for a pretext with U.S. collusion.

Mearsheimer also said the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) was the "driving force" behind efforts in Congress to remove language from pro-Israel war resolutions that called on all sides to preserve civilian life.

In fact, JTA has established that the initiative was purely Republican and had nothing to do with AIPAC. Some pro-Israel lobbyists told JTA they found the partisan dustup on the issue distasteful.

The appearance at an event hosted by CAIR, a group that calls for cuts in U.S. funding to Israel and in the past has been accused of excusing Arab terrorism, was enough for some to underscore the lack of seriousness of men once better known as leading advocates of "realist" foreign policy – the school that argues that nations pursue power, not ideals, in their foreign dealings.

Eric Rozenman, Washington director for the committee for accuracy in Middle East reporting in America, the first group to deconstruct the Israel Lobby paper, said Mearsheimer and Walt were marginalizing themselves. "This shows how far from academic moorings they've drifted," he said.

But that doesn't mean they should be ignored, said Foxman, who noted that the professors had speaking engagements planned on the topic.

Ya'alon: Israel's leaders should quit

By GIL HOFFMAN AND YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Amir Peretz and Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz should take responsibility for their failures during the second Lebanon war, and resign, former IDF chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. (res.) Moshe Ya'alon said last week.

Ya'alon, whom polls show would be a serious candidate for prime minister if he decided to run with the Likud, blamed prime minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza Strip disengagement for causing the war.

Responding to charges from Olmert's associates blaming his policies as IDF chief for the war, Ya'alon told the Jerusalem Post, in his first interview with an Israeli media outlet since his return from the United States last week, that until disengagement, Hezbollah had restrained itself, but that withdrawing unilaterally from Gaza had encouraged it to attack.

"I am in favour of a state commission of inquiry to investigate," Ya'alon said.

Israel and the international community must wake up from their approach of appeasement and make Iran and Syria pay a price for the war in Lebanon, Ya'alon said.

Ya'alon started work this week at the new Institute for International and Middle Eastern Studies at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem-based academic institute. Together with Prof. Martin Kramer and other top scholars, he came to the institute to strategize how Israel and the world should respond to the Islamic fundamentalist threat. "When Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad says Israel should be wiped off the map, he means to destroy the West," Ya'alon said. "The world is sleeping. We are sleeping, too."

Moshe Ya'alon

Upon taking over as chief of General Staff in 2002, Ya'alon said he believed that Hezbollah was in the midst of undergoing a process of restraining itself. Every Hezbollah provocation, he said, was met by a fierce IDF response. The world, he said, was also beginning to recognize Hezbollah as a terror group, and Israel was succeeding against Hezbollah both diplomatically and militarily. But then came disengagement.

"The disengagement was portrayed as a victory for terrorism, and it was a reward for Hezbollah and the Palestinians," said Ya'alon, a vocal critic of withdrawal.

Calling Israel's war against Hezbollah the "world's war," he said that the international community's approach of appeasement "encourages terror against the world."

"I am worried by the world's behaviour," he said. "The West is stronger than Islamic fundamentalism, but the West's lack of determination worries me."

UN Security Council Resolution 1701, which called for a ceasefire between Israel and Hezbollah, was another act of appeasement, Ya'alon said.

"The world agrees that Lebanon must have sovereignty and that Hezbollah must be disarmed. Most of Lebanon is in favour," he said. "But the world put out a resolution that helped Hezbollah with a ceasefire and the rest is just declarative... the disarmament of Hezbollah should have been possible to achieve even without a war."

Iran and Syria, he said, had to be held accountable for the war. He said that Hezbollah was their proxy, and the world was letting Iran and Syria get away without paying a price.

"We have to handle this at a diplomatic level," he said. "Iran uses proxies, and Syria plays the role of facilitator, and the world is letting them get away with it. We need a diplomatic effort to make sure the world holds them responsible."

If Syria and Iran didn't pay a price, he said, it would put into question Israel's achievements in the war.

Nablus bomb-maker killed

Israeli special forces killed a senior Palestinian terrorist form the Al-Aksa Brigade in Nablus last week. Security sources said he was wanted for recruiting and equipping suicide bombers. In the Gaza Strip, tanks and troops withdrew from the district of Shajayia after an almost weeklong mission to uncover a tunnel dug by Palestinian terrorists intent on attacking an Israeli border position. Twenty Palestinians, most of them gunmen, had been killed trying to repel the Israeli force. Palestinian terrorists fired at least three rockets from Gaza into Israel, but caused no damage or casualties.

Israelis want independent probe of war

Most Israelis want an independent inquiry into the recent Lebanon war, a survey found. Israel Radio published the results of an opinion poll it conducted on Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's decision to limit probes of the 34-day offensive against Hezbollah to a government-appointed panel. Sixty-four percent of respondents were unhappy with the decision, preferring that an independent body look into the war's planning and execution, the station reported. The findings added to pressure mounting on the Olmert government since an Aug. 14 truce ended the Lebanon war. Israeli media reported that even Olmert's junior partner in the coalition, Labor Party chief and Defence Minister Amir Peretz, favoured an independent probe. According to the Israel Radio survey, there is waning support for Olmert within his Kadima Party, with only 15 per cent saying they would vote for him if there were an election today. Thirty-nine percent said they preferred Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni to head Kadima and 46 per cent were undecided.

Labor chief challenged

The head of Israel's Labor Party is facing his first formal leadership challenge. Two senior Laborites announced they would run against Amir Peretz in the party primary, currently scheduled for May 2007. The two contenders, former security chief Ami Ayalon and veteran economist Avishai Braverman, agreed they would campaign jointly, though they have not yet determined who will be the lead candidate against Peretz. The Labor leader also faces potential challenges from Ehud Barak, Danny Yatom and Matan Vilnai, all party members with strong military backgrounds.

Lebanese leader cool to peace treaty

Lebanon's prime minister said his country would not sign an independent peace deal with Israel. "Let it be clear, we are not seeking any agreement until there is just and comprehensive peace based on the Arab initiative," Fouad Siniora said.

He was referring to a proposal endorsed by the Arab League in 2002 under which Israel's neighbours would make peace if Israel withdraws from all territory captured in the 1967 Six-Day War and accepts a solution to the "right of return" demanded for millions of Palestinian refugees and their descendants. Israel rejected the initiative, saying peace should come without preconditions. Siniora announced this week that his government would pay compensation to Lebanese whose property was damaged in the conflict, an apparent bid to offset similar payouts being made by Hezbollah.

Livni spared lawsuit

Danish authorities turned down a request to prosecute Israel's visiting foreign minister for alleged war crimes. The Attorney General's Office in Copenhagen rejected the appeal filed by a left-wing lawmaker against Tzipi Livni, who visited Denmark this week as part of a European tour, Israel Radio reported. The lawmaker had argued that Livni should be arrested and prosecuted for her role in Israel's recent offensive against Hezbollah.

Sharon's condition improves

Doctors reported improvement in the condition of the comatose Ariel Sharon after he was treated for pneumonia. Israel's former prime minister was moved back to the rehabilitation unit of Tel Aviv's Sheba Medical Center after two weeks in intensive care. Doctors reported a "noticeable improvement in his kidney function and the pneumonia in his lungs." Sharon suffered a major stroke Jan. 4 and is not expected to recover.

He begged to take command of his tank

By URIEL DOMB

Feature

On Wednesday morning Aug. 9, as the latest war between Israel and Lebanon was picking up momentum, Seren (Capt.) Gilad Stuckelman's Merkava-2 tank hit a huge mine in the Lebanese village of Ayta-al-Shaab, just across from the Israeli village of Zaryit, where the war started four weeks earlier. The tank's massive turret blew off and then a Russian Koronet anti-tank missile hit the chassis, setting it on fire. Gilad and his crew of three, all young reserve soldiers, were instantly killed. They never knew what hit them or felt anything.

I first met Gilad in Toronto a little over three years ago, just following his long military service in the Israel Defence Forces elite 7th tank brigade. Gilad was 23 at the time and came to Canada to "breathe some fresh air" and "see the world," before deciding what he wanted to make of his life – not unlike many other Israeli youth following the strenuous military service.

We were looking for an Israeli Hebrew teacher for our youngest kids, Arielle, 10, and Mikey, 8, so they could learn to speak "real" Hebrew, and Gilad was a match made in heaven. Within a few months, both children started to speak with a real Israeli accent and vocabulary, and Mikey became a big fan of Maccabi Tel Aviv and the 7th brigade. Every Thursday evening following the Hebrew lesson and an Israeli supper, Gilad and Mikey were glued to our satellite TV to watch the latest Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball game. Often Gilad would fall asleep in our family room and stay until morning. We all loved him, and he became an integral part of our family.

In the cold winter months we made sure he didn't go home without a coat and gloves – something he had a hard time getting used to after Israel.

We had another common tie – music. Gilad never learned music formally and couldn't read a musical note, but he could sit at the piano and play almost any tune by heart. He was a real pro on the guitar, and often we would combine all our musical talents – voice, cello, piano and guitar to play Israeli songs. At other times, he would sit in our living room and listen to our daughter Gabi practise the Elgar cello concerto with Arielle singing arias from operas he loved. Music almost moved him to tears.

Though Gilad kept himself busy in Toronto with a variety of odd jobs including baking doughnuts and selling paintings, we all recognized that he had a deep intellectual curiosity combined with a maturity beyond his age – something he must have developed during his career as a tank officer. We kept on urging him to go to university, and he knew that someday he would, but he still wanted to discover other parts of Canada and travel to South America.

He accomplished both with the same drive and determination that characterized everything else he did. He travelled through Bolivia, Peru and Ecuador the way few natives have ever done, managing to befriend the locals in spite of the language barrier. By the time he reached Sao Paulo, Brazil, he already managed to have his passport, airline ticket and most of his money stolen. We asked our good friend Oscar to take care of him in Sao Paulo. That he did, in an armoured Mercedes, showing him the sights and ending up in the fashionable Jewish country club in Morumbi, Sao Paulo.

After his adventures in South America, Gilad was almost ready to settle down. He returned home to his parents Micha and Rachel and brothers Eliran, Yarden and Yair in the beautiful hilltop village of Timrat in the Yizrael valley, not far from Nazareth. We would visit him and his family there often, and he and Mikey despite their age difference of 14 years were like two close brothers. When Gabi attended an international cello workshop in Israel in 2005, Gilad came to the concerts and felt right at home surrounded by musicians from around the world.

He also began the lengthy application process to university, and was successful in gaining admission to the Hebrew University and Haifa University. He planned to major in economics and Far Eastern studies. But Gilad hadn't quite gotten rid of his travel itch yet, so he decided to become an El Al flight attendant for another short while before going on to university. That gave him another opportunity to visit Canada, and on one of these occasions he brought his parents along to show them the country he loved most after Israel, and visit our family who had adopted him as a son.

Gilad Stuckelman

Our last encounter took place in Israel on Tuesday, Aug. 1. The war was already in its third week, Katyusha rockets were raining on the northern region of Israel on a daily basis and the reserves were being called up. I went to Israel the day before to see what I could do to help out in the war and telephoned Gilad to get the latest scoop. He had received a call-up order from his reserves tank brigade the previous week, but at the last moment the call-up was suspended. So he decided to squeeze in another trip to New York as an El Al flight attendant on Wednesday, Aug. 2. We agreed to meet in Timrat at midday on Tuesday on my way up north.

With his typical Israeli demeanor, Gilad opened a bottle of rosé wine he bought in New York and chopped up a watermelon. We spent a lovely hour talking and laughing – myself, Gilad and his young brother, Yair. The parents were away and his other two brothers were already in the army. We didn't pay much attention to the sirens warning people to go to the shelter; neither did we realize it was our last encounter, forever. We both felt the war would end as soon as the reserves marched across the border.

The following day, Gilad flew to New York, and I ended up volunteering in the Magen David Adom station in Metulla right on the Lebanese border. I stayed there for more than a week under almost continuous Katyusha bombardment, but was never afraid for my life. Neither were the brave residents of Metulla or the soldiers stationed around there. One day, though, a direct Katyusha salvo hit an encampment of Israeli reserve soldiers near us at Kfar Giladi, killing 12 soldiers and injuring many others. Our station and ambulances participated in the rescue operation and many others.

As soon as Gilad reached his hotel in New York he checked his cellular phone messages from home. One of the messages was an immediate recall from the army to report to his unit. He wasn't due to fly back for another few days, but managed to talk El Al into letting him fly return the next day as a passenger. El Al had to fly another attendant from Israel to take his place.

He reached his reserves tank brigade on the western sector of the Lebanon border on Saturday, Aug. 5 and begged his commander to allow him to take command of his tank. Four days later, he was killed. He didn't even have a chance to get to know his tank comrades. They all shared the same tragic fate. I immediately came from Metulla to be with his family. I felt like I had lost a son.

Gilad was laid to rest two days later in a full military ceremony attended by more than 500 friends and relatives, and many officers and soldiers from his brigade, who were given a special leave from the front line for a few hours. He was the first military casualty in Timrat, and was given a place of honour in the famous military cemetery of Nahalal on the gentle hill of Timrat, close by Moshe Dayan and Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli astronaut. Gilad, born in the Jordan Valley settlement of Gitit, would have turned 27 on Sept. 6. For us, he would live forever.

Gaza journalists protest censorship

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

GAZA CITY, Gaza – Palestinian journalists in the Gaza Strip complained last Tuesday that they were being subjected to a campaign of intimidation and terror by various armed groups and urged the Palestinian Authority to punish those responsible.

Several Palestinian journalists and editors have been killed or beaten over the past few years by unidentified gunmen, especially in the Gaza Strip. Until today, none of the assailants have been caught.

At a demonstration outside the offices of the Palestinian Legislative Council in Gaza City, dozens of journalists said they were suffering from growing attempts to restrict their work.

"We condemn all methods of terror and threats practised by some irresponsible parties in Palestinian society against Palestinian newsmen," said one of the journalists. "We are facing attacks from internal and external forces."

The journalists urged the PA to guarantee freedom of expression in its territories and take legal action against anyone who threatens or attacks them. They also denounced the recent kidnapping of two Fox News journalists in Gaza City and said those who carried out the abduction acted against the interests of the Palestinians.

Ibrahim Barakat, a Fatah activist who joined the protest, described the kidnapping of the journalists as an "immoral act that distorts the image of the Palestinian people's struggle." He urged the PA to reveal the identity of the kidnappers and to bring them to court without delay.

Some of the journalists also attacked Israel for wounding some of their colleagues during Israel Defence Forces incursions into the Gaza Strip.

In a separate development, a row has erupted between journalists in the Gaza Strip over a meeting some of them held earlier last week with PA Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

The Palestinian Journalists Syndicate, a body dominated by Fatah supporters, accused Haniyeh's office of "discrimination" in deciding who would attend the meeting. It claimed that only Hamas-affiliated journalists were invited to the meeting.

"Haniyeh's office ignored journalists working in important media outlets such as Palestine TV and the Wafa News Agency," the syndicate said. "This is a very serious development that will have repercussions on many levels."

According to the syndicate, Haniyeh's decision to boycott many of its members coincides with increased attempts to terrorize Palestinian journalists and prevent them from carrying out their jobs.

In response, the 13 journalists who were invited to interview Haniyeh launched a scathing attack on the syndicate, accusing it of stupidity and impotence. They said the attack on Haniyeh's office was an indication that the syndicate was acting out of "factional considerations." They said the syndicate had lost its right to represent all journalists because of the behaviour of its heads.

Jamal Nazzal, a spokesperson for Fatah in the West Bank, accused the Hamas-controlled government of harassing local journalists and media outlets.

Holiday Food Ideas

Food traditions may provide comfort

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As has been the case many times in the past, this year has not been an easy one for Jews worldwide. With the High Holy Days almost upon us then, it is a good time to call upon our traditions to help us in our quest for a sweet and prosperous new year.

Food plays a large part in these traditions. We dip apples in honey and eat pomegranates whose seeds represent a new year filled with many mitzvot.

Editorial

While many people bake round challot that represent the never-ending circle of life, some shape their challah like a ladder, symbolizing the fortunes of people for the year ahead when some will ascend and others will descend life's ladder.

Often, the custom is to bake raisins in the challah, perhaps to enhance its sweetness.

Sephardi Jews may serve a whole fish to wish for prosperity, fertility and good luck in the coming year, and some Jews present fruit baskets covered to hide the contents, symbolizing the idea that no one can know what the new year will bring.

These are all customs, however, and people may interpret them in the same way as their own families did before them, or in their own new, special way. We may serve traditional foods before the meal or incorporate them into our holiday meals.

In our upcoming holiday food supplements, we've tried to offer both traditional recipes, so that readers can get a glimpse of holidays past, and some new recipe ideas for those who want to put an original twist on their dinners.

Whether you're making your first holiday dinner, or you're a veteran meal planner, we're sure to have something to offer.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you happy cooking and a Shanah Tovah.

Take advantage of fall harvest produce

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

This Rosh Hashanah, take advantage of all the late harvest produce still overflowing at grocery stores and farmers' markets. Beets with orange, already colourful and bursting with flavour, is made all the more remarkable with fresh basil. Likewise, the easy and mouth watering mushroom and hazelnut stuffing for the chicken (or turkey) includes some zucchini as well as parsley, both bountiful at this time of year. I've also taken advantage of Indian summer fruit in a rather unconventional dessert, pairing peaches and raspberries in a wonderful rustic crisp. Feel free to follow tradition, however, and substitute apples for the peaches.

BEETS WITH ORANGE

In a pinch, you can substitute three cans (15 oz. each) of beets. Drain and cube as directed. Or, if your oven is already otherwise occupied, boil beets in boiling salted water for about 50 minutes or until tender. Proceed as directed.

3 lb. fresh beets, scrubbed and trimmed
1 tsp salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
4 fresh oranges, segmented
1/4 cup chopped fresh basil or mint

Dressing:
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed orange juice
2 tbsp. raspberry or red wine vinegar
1 tsp. honey
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

Place large piece of foil on work counter. Arrange half of beets snuggly in one layer in centre of foil; drizzle with half of olive oil. Sprinkle with half of salt and pepper. Fold foil tightly to enclose beets. Repeat with another large piece of foil and remaining beets, olive oil, salt and pepper. Place on large rimmed baking sheet.

Roast in centre of preheated 400-degree oven for 45 to 60 minutes or until beets are tender when pierced with a fork. Cool slightly; peel and cut into 1/2-inch cubes. Place in bowl.

Meanwhile, in separate bowl, whisk together garlic, orange juice, vinegar, honey, salt and pepper. Slowly whisk in olive oil until well emulsified. Pour half over beets while still warm. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 6 hours or for up to 24 hours.

Before serving, toss orange segments with beets, drizzling with remaining dressing. Gently stir in basil. To serve, line salad plate with lettuce and mound beet mixture in centre. Makes 8 servings.

ROAST CHICKEN WITH HAZELNUT MUSHROOM STUFFING

You can use half the stuffing in a large chicken, about 6 pounds, and bake the remainder alongside in a casserole dish. It makes enough for a 14- to 15-pound turkey.

1/3 cup Dijon mustard
2 tsp. soy sauce
4 tsp. all-purpose flour
2 cups chicken stock (approx.)

Hazelnut Mushroom Stuffing:
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
6 cups coarsely chopped mushrooms
1 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/2 cup margarine or chicken stock
2 onions, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
2 stalks celery, chopped
1 large zucchini, grated and drained
10 cups cubed day-old French or Italian bread
1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley
1 cup coarsely chopped toasted hazelnuts

Heat oil in large skillet set over medium heat. Add mushrooms and half of salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for 8 to 10 minutes or until lightly browned and any excess liquid has evaporated. Transfer to bowl. Melt margarine in same skillet; add onions, garlic, celery and remaining salt and pepper. Cook, stirring occasionally, for about 7 minutes or until softened. Add to mushrooms, along with zucchini, bread, parsley and hazelnuts, tossing together until everything is thoroughly moistened.

Remove giblets and neck from chicken. Rinse and pat chicken dry inside and out.

Loosely place about 1 cup of stuffing into body cavity of chicken, without packing. Transfer remainder to 8-cup greased casserole. Pour 1/4 cup of chicken stock over casserole. Cover casserole with foil and set aside.

In small bowl, combine mustard with soy sauce; brush all over chicken.

Roast in centre of preheated 325-degree oven, basting occasionally, for 2 1/2 to 3 hours or until juices run clear when chicken is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in thigh registers 185. Remove chicken from pan to a warm platter; tent chicken with foil.

Add casserole to oven during last hour; cook, covered, moistening stuffing every 20 minutes with about 3 tbsp of stock. Uncover casserole and bake for an additional 10 minutes or until topping is crisp.

Meanwhile, skim fat from pan juices, sprinkle flour over juices; cook over medium high heat, stirring, for 1 minute. Pour in 1 cup chicken stock and any juices from platter. Boil, stirring, until thickened. Strain into warmed gravy boat and serve with stuffing and chicken. Makes 8 servings.

PEACH AND RASPBERRY CRISP

If you are substituting apples, you will need about 8 cups of peeled, cored apple slices. Try to use an apple that will keep its shape as it cooks, such as Golden Delicious or Northern Spy.

12 large peaches (or 8 cups frozen sliced peaches)
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
3 tbsp. all purpose flour
2 cups fresh raspberries

Topping:
1 1/2 cups all purpose flour
1 cup quick cooking rolled oats
1 cup packed brown sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
2/3 cup melted margarine or butter

Using small paring knife, cut an "x" at the base of each peach. Immerse by twos or threes into boiling water for 30 seconds. Using slotted spoon, remove one by one and place in bowl of ice water. Peel and slice into thick wedges; let cool completely in large bowl. Once cool, gently stir in brown sugar and flour, tossing to coat well. Gently stir in raspberries. Transfer mixture to an 8-10-cup rectangular or oval baking dish.

In separate bowl, combine flour, oats, brown sugar and cinnamon. Pour margarine over, stirring until mixture is clumpy and crumbly. Sprinkle topping evenly over fruit. Place on rimmed baking sheet.

Bake in centre of preheated 350-degree oven for about 1 hour or until top is golden and crisp and fruit is tender.

Can be served warm or made 24 hours ahead and rewarmed for 20 to 30 minutes in the oven at 350. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Eat symbolic foods for Rosh Hashanah

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Many Jews have a special short ceremony on the first night of Rosh Hashanah immediately after Kiddush and Hamotzi are recited and the apples are dipped in honey. In this ceremony, called Yehi Ratzon, blessings are said over foods with symbolic value. After the apple, one can then have all, none or some of the other symbolic foods. There is also no special order in which they should be eaten.

Here are some of the symbolic foods and the blessings that accompany them:

- Apple and honey: that we be renewed for a good and sweet year
- Black-eyed peas: that our merits multiply
- Carrots: to increase our merits
- Leek or cabbage: that our enemies be decimated
- Beets: that our adversaries be removed
- Dates: that our enemies be consumed
- Gourd: that our merits be proclaimed before God
- Pomegranate: that our merits increase like the seeds of a pomegranate
- Fish: that we be fruitful and multiply like fish
- The head of a fish: that we be like the head and not like the tail

All the quantities in these recipes will depend on how you serve them – whether for just a taste or as a side dish.

BLACK-EYED PEA SALAD

I find it interesting that in the American South it is traditional for both Jew and non-Jew to eat black-eyed peas on New Year's Day for good luck.

16 oz. black-eyed peas, dried or frozen
1 mild red onion, diced or 2 garlic cloves, minced
salt and black pepper to taste
1/2 tsp. cumin, optional
5 tbsp. olive oil
1/3 to 1/2 cup lemon juice

If using dried black-eyed peas, cover the peas with water and soak overnight. Drain the water. Place the peas in a saucepan and cover with water. Boil the peas until tender. Drain and dry the peas. If using frozen black-eyed peas, thaw and simmer until tender. Mix the peas with the remaining ingredients. Makes 8 side dish servings.

PUMPKIN OR GOURD SCONES

1 tbsp. margarine
1/2 cup sugar
1 egg
2 cups self-rising flour
1 cup cooked, mashed cold pumpkin or gourd or canned pumpkin
1/8 tsp. salt

Grease a baking tray. Cream together the margarine and sugar until light and fluffy. Add egg and beat well. Add pumpkin, flour and salt and fold in by hand. Knead lightly and cut into 1-in. squares. Place close together on the baking tray and bake at 425 until well risen and golden on top (about 15 minutes). Serve warm. Makes 4 servings.

Honey production in Israel - a sweet undertaking

By BATSHEVA POMERANTZ
IPS

Honey is a popular ingredient in Rosh Hashanah dishes, and the greeting, "Shanah tovah u'metukah," "Have a good and sweet year," is on everyone's lips. At the festive Rosh Hashanah meal, a piece of challah trickled with honey is followed by a slice of apple dipped in honey, and honey cake often tops off the feast as a classic dessert.

Because of an increased local demand for honey in recent years, the proverbial Land of Milk and Honey (whose 90,000 beehives produce a whopping 3,600 tons of honey annually) has found itself in the unlikely situation of having to import honey.

In order to solve the problem, the Jewish National Fund earmarked certain forests for beehives and agreed to provide the Honey Council with some 100,000 nectar-producing saplings and plants each year. When this didn't suffice, the JNF, together with the country's 500 apiarists, took further action, and in early 2006, implemented the planting of some 200,000 additional trees as a source of nectar for bees. Beekeepers can now travel with their beehives to one of 6,300 pasture points around the country, and the situation has improved greatly.

The raising of honey bees first took off in the Land of Israel in the late 19th century. However, in the biblical era, honey was made from dates, and many people believe the notion of a "land flowing with milk and honey" actually referred to date honey.

Fifth-generation apiarist Malka Ben Zeev of the Dvorat HaTavor Land of Silk and Honey Center in the Lower Galilee, can trace her profession back to her Hungarian ancestors. Her agronomist husband Yigal learned the art of rearing silkworms in Iran in the late 1960s when he was an emissary of the Israeli government. The two joined forces, and in 1970, the newlyweds established the only silkworm breeding farm in Israel and began developing a successful honey production business at Moshav Shadmot Dvora, a stone's throw from Mount Tabor and the second-century BCE Silk Road.

Dvorat HaTavor, which is recognized by the Israel government as an agro-tourism attraction, enjoys visits from students of all ages, retirees and groups of young people from the Diaspora. A program in Arabic is geared to the Arab residents of the Galilee.

The visitors centre employs Galilee residents – often recently discharged Israel Defence Forces soldiers – as guides, to explain about removal of the combs and extraction of the honey from the hives, each of which produces approximately 45 kilograms of honey a year.

"We place our hives in Galilee fields where there are natural wildflowers," Malka Ben Zeev explains, "and avoid orange or avocado orchards that are sprayed with pesticides. The bees graze on white forest flowers according to the season. In the summer, our honey is produced from thistles."

Israel has two to three blossom seasons when the bees suck the nectar from more than 100 types of plants, starting the production process. The plants are divided into cultivated plants, like citrus – from which most of the honey is produced in Israel – and wildflowers. The flowers from which the nectar is collected affect the flavour and colour of the honey. Plants include avocado, marjoram, eucalyptus, thorns, citrus, three-lobed sage, thyme and clover.

Some types of honey, like those made from avocado and eucalyptus nectar, are suitable for roasting meat, while others, from the nectar of wildflowers for example, are best for lighter meals of leafy salads, fruit and yogurt. Honey produced from citrus is good for baking cakes and dishes with a dough base.

Honey has been used for thousands of years for health purposes. Its shelf life is so long that jars of still edible honey have been discovered entombed with Egyptian mummies.

According to the Honey Council, honey is a sterile, natural food that can be effective in warding off winter illnesses and boosting appetite and energy. As a sweetener, honey has 25 per cent fewer calories than sugar, with 25 to 30 calories per teaspoonful.

A wonderful collection of honey pots

Healthy by-products of the beehive include propolis, "the natural antibiotic," which protects the beehive from illness. It is scraped from each hive in small quantities and used in anti-fungus creams, creams to soothe the skin and sprays for irritated throats. Another healthful by-product is pollen, which is used to nourish the bees and is rich in vitamins, including vitamin B-12.

"Propolis and pollen are expensive because of the intensive work needed to extract them from the beehive," Ben Zeev notes.

Finally, it's interesting to look at the hard-working bees who must visit more than 4.5 million flowers and travel over 140,000 kilometres to produce a single kilogram of honey so that we may enjoy this traditional treat on Rosh Hashanah.

Note: In 2004, the apiarists' organization in Israel changed the name of its profession. Until then an apiarist was known as a kavran, which although spelled differently, sounded identical to the word for "undertaker" in Hebrew! An Israeli apiarist is now called a dvorai, from dvora (bee).

A holiday meal from sides to desserts

LEEK FRITTERS WITH GARLIC

4 cups leeks, cleaned and thinly sliced (white part only)
1 tbsp. olive oil
3 cloves garlic crushed
1 tbsp. parsley, chopped
3 eggs, beaten
1 tbsp. flour
salt and black pepper to taste
olive oil for frying

Cut off the bottoms of the leeks and discard. Thinly slice the white part only of the leeks. Rinse and drain well. Discard the dark green tops of the leeks. Heat a large frying pan and add the oil, garlic and leeks. Saute quickly over high heat for 3 minutes. Remove to a bowl to cool. Add the remaining ingredients to the bowl and mix together.

Heat a large nonstick frying pan and add the oil for frying. Measure out 1/2 cup quantities of the fritter mixture and add to the hot pan. Flatten each one slightly and fry over medium heat until golden brown on both sides. You will have to do this in batches so there is ample room in the frying pan. Add more oil, if necessary. Remove to drain on paper towels, and serve hot. Makes 6 side dish servings.

BEET SALAD WITH APPLES

You can substitute canned beets for the fresh if desired.

7 medium beets
2 tart apples
1 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. prepared mustard
4 tbsp. mayonnaise
1 tsp. sugar
salt and freshly ground pepper

Preheat oven to 350. Wrap each beet in a piece of foil, sealing tight. Place all the beet packages on a foil-lined baking dish. Bake for 60 to 75 minutes. Leave the beet packages on the baking dish, but carefully pull open a corner of the foil package to let the steam escape. Let the beet packages sit in this manner for 5-10 minutes. Carefully open the foil package more fully. Let the beet packages sit in this manner for an additional 5-10 minutes or until the beets can be handled comfortably.

Slide your fingers over the surface of the beets and the skin of the beets will peel off easily. Cut the beets into 1/4-in. julienne sticks. Coarsely grate the apples and combine with the beet sticks. Add the remaining ingredients and blend well. Taste and adjust seasoning with salt and pepper. Serve cold. Makes 8-10 servings.

DATE BALLS

1 cup sugar
2 eggs
1/2 cup all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
8 oz. pitted dates, chopped
1/4 cup sugar for rolling

Preheat oven to 350. In a mixing bowl, beat 1 cup sugar with eggs until fluffy. In a separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder and salt. Blend dry ingredients into the sugar mixture. Fold in dates. Spoon batter into a greased 8-inch square pan; bake for 30 minutes. Remove from oven and stir immediately with a wooden spoon. Let cool completely, then roll mixture into 1-inch balls and toss in 1/4 cup sugar. Makes 36 date balls.

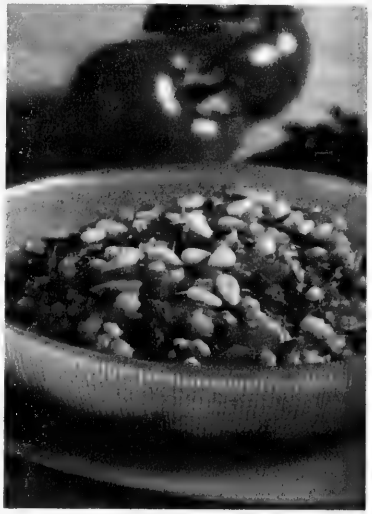
Holiday Food Ideas

Pan pals share traditions and recipes from around the world

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

As I write this article, it's hard to believe that the long, hot summer is nearly over and the High Holy Days are just around the corner. It's always an adventure to find out what my friends from different corners of the globe are cooking for the holidays and to learn about their special traditions. Here are some tasty offerings from their kitchens, along with some food for thought. Enjoy!



Although Ruth Baks lives in Jerusalem, we share a special friendship over the miles because of our love of good food. We've never met in person, but thanks to the Internet, it seems like we've known each other for years! Originally hailing from San Diego, Ruth came to Israel when she was a student and never left. She is an amazing cook, very knowledgeable and articulate. She is well-known in my culinary circle for her excellent Sababa, a delicious chocolate liquor that she bottles and sells. I am lucky enough to own a bottle and I save it for very special celebrations.

Ruth and I became "pan-pals" through the Jewish Food list http://www.jewishfoodlist.com/, a worldwide online food community with a membership of more than 1,800 members from 39 countries around the world. If you have a culinary question or are looking for a special recipe from your childhood, there's a good chance you'll find it there!

Ruth Baks is currently writing a Shabbat cookbook and there is no doubt it will be fabulous, so be sure to reserve a space for it on your cookbook shelf! Ruth was generous enough to share her recipe for this fragrant carrot souffle with me, along with her enlightening comments about special Rosh Hashanah traditions.

CARROT SOUFFLE WITH CANDIED PECANS

Combine in a medium saucepan:
6 cups water
2 lbs. carrots, peeled and sliced (4 cups sliced)
1½-in. knob fresh ginger root, peeled and sliced
1 stick cinnamon or cassia bark dash of salt

Bring to boil; cover and reduce heat. Cook for 25 minutes or until carrots are very tender; drain. Discard cinnamon. Preheat oven to 350. Transfer cooked carrots and ginger to bowl of food processor fitted with the steel blade.

Add:
5 oz. butter or margarine
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice, strained

Purée, occasionally scraping down sides of processor bowl, until smooth and creamy.

Add:
1⅔ cups sugar
4 large eggs
⅓ cup all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. vanilla extract
1½ tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg

Purée until smooth. Taste and adjust flavouring. Turn into well greased, 9-cup shallow oval casserole. Smooth top with spatula. (Note: Casserole should be filled no more than 75 per cent as the soufflé will puff up. When baked, this recipe will fill a 9-cup casserole all the way to the very top. A 9 x 9 x 2-in. square baking dish may also be used.)

For candied pecan topping, combine in 1-quart bowl:
¾ cup packed light brown sugar
¾ cup coarsely chopped pecans (see note)
6 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1 tsp. ground cinnamon

Add:
3 tbsp. melted unsalted butter or margarine
1 tbsp. Bourbon (optional)

Stir until crumbly; sprinkle over soufflé.

Dust lightly over top with ¼ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg.

Place casserole on centre rack of preheated oven and bake at 350 for about 1 hour or until soufflé is puffed and set, and top is beautifully crusted. Serve warm.

Do not cover when reheating, in order to preserve the crisp topping. Serves 10.

Note: There are numerous customs regarding the eating of nuts on Rosh Hashanah. If your custom or preference is to avoid nuts, you may omit the pecans, but do not omit the rest of the crunchy, candied topping!

SEVEN-VEGETABLE COUSCOUS

1½ cups couscous
3 cups boiling water
1 tbsp. margarine
1 tsp. turmeric
1 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. light olive oil
2 medium onions, chopped
1 cup finely shredded white cabbage
1 medium turnip, peeled and diced
1 medium yellow summer squash, halved lengthwise and sliced ¼-in. thick
1 medium zucchini, halved lengthwise and sliced ¼-in. thick
½ cup cooked or drained canned chickpeas
1½ cups diced ripe tomatoes
1 tsp. freshly grated ginger
½ tsp. each: ground cumin, coriander, turmeric and salt

Garnish:

½ cup golden raisins or finely chopped dried apricots
½ cup sliced or slivered almonds

Combine the couscous and water in a heatproof bowl. Cover and let stand until water is absorbed, about 15 minutes. Fluff with a fork, then stir in the margarine, turmeric and salt. Cover and set aside.

For the vegetable stew, heat the oil in a large saucepan or soup pot. Add the onions and saute over moderate heat until translucent. Stir in cabbage and saute until both it and the onion are lightly golden.

Add remaining stew ingredients. Bring to a simmer, then cover and reduce the heat to medium-low. Cook, stirring occasionally, for 15 to 20 minutes. Add water as needed to produce a moist, but not soupy, consistency. The vegetables should be tender, but still firm.

To serve, arrange the couscous on the outer edge of a large serving platter. Pour vegetable mixture in the centre, then sprinkle with the garnishes. Let each guest place a mound of couscous on his or her dinner plate and top it with the vegetable mixture. Serves 8.

Foodie-friend Chantal Clabrough of Montreal is the author of A Pied Noir Cookbook, French Sephardic Cuisine from Algeria. Her fascinating cookbook is not only a family memoir, but is packed with food history.

Chantal writes, "Fruit is an integral part of the meal and is usually regarded as blessed, especially those fruits mentioned in the Bible, such as dates, figs, carobs and pomegranates.

"The seven biblical foods are also present on the table: barley, wheat, raisins, figs, pomegranates, green olives and honey. I often make this chicken dish with olives because it is very easy to prepare and tastes light and fresh."

CHICKEN WITH OLIVES

¼ cup olive oil
1 onion, diced
2 lb. boneless, skinless chicken, cubed
2 beefsteak tomatoes, diced
1 cup green olives, pitted
2 cups whole button mushrooms
½ tsp. paprika
1 cup dry white wine juice of 1 lemon
4 fresh thyme sprigs
2 fresh parsley sprigs
2 bay leaves
salt and pepper

Preheat oven to 375. Heat the olive oil in a large pot, then saute the onions and brown the chicken.

Pour the chicken, onion and drippings into an 8-inch baking dish. Spread the tomatoes, olives and mushrooms around and on top of the chicken. Sprinkle the paprika over the chicken.

Pour the white wine and lemon juice over the chicken. Place the thyme, parsley and bay leaves on top and add salt and pepper to taste.

Bake for 25 to 30 minutes, or until the chicken is cooked through. Spoon the juices over the chicken from time to time. Serve with rice or vegetables.

Serves 4. Multiplies easily for a crowd.

Israeli organization treats kids with heart diseases

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

The Canadian chapter of the Israeli-based humanitarian organization Save A Child's Heart (SACH), which treats children from the Third World and developing countries born with congenital heart diseases, is hosting a fundraising concert on Nov. 11.

Liel

The concert at the Toronto Centre For The Arts features Israeli songbird Liel. The former head of cardiac surgery at the Hospital For Sick Children, Dr. Bill Williams, will be honoured at the event.

Ephraim Diamond, president of SACH Canada, said about $60,000 was raised last year without a fundraising concert and the organization hopes to raise more than $100,000 this year.

Through SACH, established in 1996 by the late Dr. Ami Cohen, more than 4,000 children born with congenital abnormalities from at least 25 different countries have received free medical exams and assessments, and approximately 1,400 of them had cardiac surgery performed at the Wolfson Medical Centre in Holon, Israel.

"[SACH] cardiologists from Israel fly into the country to assess which children are appropriate for [the operations]," said Diamond.

Poria Heisel, who heads the marketing committee of SACH Canada, said that while many children are examined annually, few of them are able make the trip to Israel. "They look at about 900 children a year and pick about 200 of them, of the most severe cases, who they think can make the trip."

The children, from infants to teenagers, stay in a house exclusively for SACH patients while they're in Israel.

"These are children with very debilitating diseases. The majority of children born with heart problems can be treated medically, but these children are born with congenital abnormalities and they would die if they weren't operated on," said Harold Heilbut, director of SACH Canada. "Depending on what country they are coming from, there is no pediatrician, never mind pediatric cardiologist."

The 70 doctors and health-care workers associated with SACH are volunteers, said Diamond, noting that the cost of each operation is about $10,000.

While 55 per cent of the children treated are from Africa, approximately 37 per cent of SACH patients are Palestinian. Every Tuesday, SACH runs a free clinic for Palestinian children from Gaza and the West Bank, Heilbut said.

"The attitude of the village changes when one of their young children have come back, from Israel, with a repaired heart," he said.

Heisel said Palestinians often have a distorted perception of Israelis before their children are treated through SACH.

"We spoke with one mother who felt very torn, coming from the Palestinian side. She thought she'd never come back alive [from Israel] with her children. She thought her child would be murdered and that she would more than likely be raped and they would never get her body back," she said.

"Well, by the time her child was perfectly well and she returned [home with her child], the village just couldn't believe it. The way they were treated in Israel and how they were looked after... They'd never experienced anything like it."

SACH has also treated children from countries such as Iraq, Moldova, Jordan, Nigeria, Russian, Zanzibar and Kazakhstan.

The organization, which is a non-governmental, receives a significant amount of Israeli support and sponsorship, said Diamond.

The European Union gave a grant of $500,000 to the organization and "KLM [airlines] has been very generous promoting Save A Child's Heart's presence on their airline," he said.

In December 2005, visitors to the KLM official website were able to download and send Christmas cards. With each card sent, 10 Flying Blue Miles – KLM airlines points – were donated to SACH, in order to sponsor a flight for a child in need of SACH's service.

Diamond, the co-founder of Cadillac Fairview Corporation Limited, got involved with the organization in 2004, when his friend Dov Bettal, who is involved in SACH in Israel, told him about a child in St. Vincent, West Indies who was in dire need of cardiac surgery.

"Apparently [the doctors of SACH] were prepared to do the heart surgery, but the parents didn't have the funding to travel from St. Vincent to Israel," he said. Moved by the story, Diamond covered the travel expenses for the child and his mother.

"Several months later, I was asked if I'd like to head the organization in Toronto, and I said I would," he said.

In addition to the examinations, operations and rehabilitation, SACH also trains medical professionals from developing countries.

"[SACH] gives advice and assistance to people who want to set up clinics in Third World countries, and, secondly, they provide services and advice to people who come to them for training in Third World countries," Diamond said.

According to SACH literature, after the organization began operating in Ethiopia, a country of 55 million people, it now has a second pediatric cardiologist. Previously, there had been only one there.

Heisel said hospital facilities at China's Habei Children's Hospital have been upgraded since the hospital partnered with Save A Child's Heart.

SACH has five offices outside of Israel, including in the United Kingdom, the United States, Germany and Australia.

Tribute raises $2.6M for Hope & Cope centre

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For a quarter-century, Sheila Kussner has been comforting the sick and dying at all hours of the day and night.

Last week, the untold numbers touched by Kussner, chair and founder of the Jewish General Hospital's Hope & Cope, said thank you.

More than 1,200 people attended the cancer patient support program's gala 25th anniversary celebration, which netted $2.6 million for its wellness centre, expected to open in October. In addition to the $600 basic ticket, 69 "Guardian Angels" contributed at least $25,000 each.

Kussner was feted as a woman of extraordinary vision, compassion and energy.

The master of ceremonies was Justin Trudeau, whose late father Pierre Elliott Trudeau was a friend of Kussner's.

Singer Celine Dion sent a videotaped message from Las Vegas; both Premier Jean Charest and Lt.-Gov. Lise Thibault spoke; and Mila Mulroney and her son Nicholas were at the head table.

This was more an evening of entertainment than of testimonial. The lineup included pianist Oliver Jones; opera singers Gianna Corbisiero and Marc Hervieux; contemporary dancers Lotta Svalberg and Pascal Sani; 12-year-old jazz singer Nikki Yanofsky; and a rousing finale with the Montreal Jubilation Choir, accompanied by the Paul Chacra Orchestra.

The event was so huge that it took up the Queen Elizabeth Hotel's Grand Salon and all the adjoining reception halls, and required a dozen video screens.

Former McGill University vice-principal and annual Peacock Luncheon toastmaster Derek Drummond, who got to know Kussner well when she was a governor of the university, used his famous wit to describe what was so special about Kussner, a "one-off," as he put it.

"She has friends in the thousands, but the truth is she prefers people with money. Above all, she is a frightening fundraiser. When she invites a man to lunch at the Ritz, it's not his wife that worries, it's his accountant."

Trudeau confided how shaken he and his young brother Sacha were by their father's final illness, prostate cancer. "It was very difficult for us to see someone who was so vital and strong stricken by such a devastating disease. It left us in a very bleak place."

They decided to put their own lives on hold and spend all the time they could with their father. "It was the wisest thing we could have done, not just for him, but for us."

Kussner, who was also attentive to the elder Trudeau in his last years, he said, understands the necessity of "healing the mind and spirit" of the sick, in addition to medical treatment.

Kussner, who lost a leg to cancer at age 14, vowed to dedicate herself to improving the non-medical care of cancer patients and their families after her husband Marvyn recovered from lymphoma, which he was diagnosed with at 42.

Hope & Cope began with eight volunteers, all cancer survivors, working in the cancer wards. They received initial support from Marjorie and Gerald Bronfman.

Today, there are over 300 volunteers, including several of the originals, and a professional staff who offer a wide range of services and conduct research. The wellness centre will provide a home-like environment where cancer patients can learn, try alternative therapies and relax.

Hope & Cope receives no government funding, and relies solely on private donations. It has overcome the early skepticism from physicians, as was evident in the video-taped tributes from top oncologists Richard Margolese and Gerald Batist, as well as former McGill dean of medicine, Abraham Fuks.

Dion, who recalled her husband Rene Angelil's cancer bout, said Hope & Cope has "put Quebec on the map" in healing cancer patients' souls and showing them how to live well.

Martin Levine, who had chaired a State of Israel Bonds tribute to Kussner, 23 years ago in the same room, was back to recite from The Book on Sheila, a delightful, biblically inspired spoof on the already mythical Kussner. Then-prime minister Trudeau was the guest speaker that night.

"It's my hope that Hope & Cope will last long after I'm gone. This is the legacy I want to leave," said Kussner. "As long as cancer is alive, I want Hope & Cope to be alive alongside it."

Kussner and her husband of 52 years took centre stage at the evening's end, and most of their remarks were appreciation for those who made the event possible and the many who have been involved with Hope & Cope over its history.

"When I think back to those early days… what I remember most clearly is the sense of passion and purpose that we all shared…

"While much has changed since the early days, and while we have grown in stature beyond my wildest expectations, what has not changed is our determination to be there, every step of the way" for the cancer patient.

"Hope & Cope was born of a dream that I had, and I suppose it is true that it became a reality because I persisted and persevered and would not take no for an answer. But to suggest that I alone am responsible for what Hope & Cope has become would be a complete misrepresentation of the truth."

She paid her highest tribute to Marvyn for his "all-encompassing support."

"He has understood and accepted the sacrifices we have had to make in order to ensure that Hope & Cope would thrive – sacrifices of time, of family life, vacations and more."

Marvyn, constantly in the background, said he has been happy to be in the supporting role all these years. "Following in Sheila's lead, helping her turn her dreams into reality, watching her work miracles on a daily basis, has been such a joy for me that I wouldn't have it any other way."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. We hear so much about the obesity epidemic among children today that I am really getting worried about the future of my young children. How can we prevent what seems, in the news, to be inevitable?

A. I am glad that parents are thinking about this because we really are seeing very scary statistics about the weight and health of our children and the unhealthy future they face if they continue on this course. I recently heard someone on TV saying that we as parents "are killing our kids with kindness," kindness in not pushing them to be more active, kindness in letting them sit in front of the TV or computer, kindness is saying yes to fast food and junk food. I really think there is a great deal of truth here.

I have a six-year-old and 7½-year old, and they feel that having a mother who is a dietitian is a great misfortune. They blame my profession for not allowing them to have pop, blue beverages, unlimited hot dogs or frequent fast food. They come home from school and camp and ask me to buy the prepackaged lunches available in the grocery store containing a host of items loaded with trans fat, saturated fat and sugar. They want money to buy large juice drinks from the vending machine at school and want me to stock our house with all the stuff they eat at friends' houses – and this peer pressure is real.

Many moms, labelled as the true heroes in our kids' young eyes, deliver hot fast food to their children at school at lunch time, direct from the drive-through window, often several times a week. The meals may include fried chicken, burgers, fries, pop and dessert, and these are the "lucky kids." They then eat this food in the classroom where the "unlucky kids" get to smell and see these enticing-looking meals while they themselves eat the "boring" sandwich and piece of fruit that their mom has packed. She's the "mean mom." This is a disaster.

As parents, the official protectors of our children, we have to take full responsibility for what we feed them. They are too young to buy it and understand their choices, and too many parents want to be popular instead of responsible. Too many parents turn a blind eye to the volume of junk their kids consume, and too many parents assume that if the grocery store sells it, and especially if it's marketed to kids, then it must be okay. Wrong!

Read labels, limit food that is coloured in an unatural way, limit processed foods high in salt and refined flour and sugar, limit junk food, and encourage others to do so as well. Otherwise we are seeing a generation headed toward higher risk of diabetes and heart disease, which are preventable, now.

It probably sounds like eating at my house is not an enjoyable experience, especially for kids, but I assure you this isn't the case. In fact, many of my kids' friends actually love eating at our house, because while the foods I offer are all healthier choices, they look normal and taste great. I make a lot of my own baked goods using less sugar, yogurt or apple sauce in place of some fat, and whole wheat flour, but my muffins, brownies, cakes and cookies are very popular. I stock up on whole wheat pita, whole wheat pizzas, wraps, popcorn, crackers and baked nachos with salsa, cheese, hummus and tzatziki. I use a lot of nuts (when our allergic friends aren't visiting), and after school, I often serve my kids and their friends what I call the house special.

This special, which is a sundae, contains a good amount of fruit, usually bananas and berries (in my house that means organic) to which I add a small scoop of frozen yogurt followed by a drizzle of chocolate sauce, and sometimes whipped cream, too. They all love it. They get a ton of fruit along with calcium and protein, they're full and happy to return, and I'm happy that they weren't served chips and a blue beverage.

I know there are a lot of other moms like me out there, who continue doing the right thing. We should all explain to our children how important good nutrition is, and try to take the popular, easy way out less often. We'll all benefit in the long run.

Remember, you are responsible for what your children eat. You can't make them love brussels sprouts, but you can stock your house with healthy food that kids like in place of junk that causes disease.

Remember too that activity also plays a huge role and must be encouraged. Make this year a healthier year for your kids and get involved in their schools, encouraging healthier eating habits.

Shanah tovah!

'Controversial' filmmaker shys away from the label

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Igal Hecht still remembers vividly one of the first films he made, Camels of Nahor, for his thesis at Seneca College.

"That was a tough movie to make," the 28-year-old Toronto filmmaker says. "We shot in -30 C weather. I had frostbite. We used to eat off the hood of my car, to keep the food warm. It was nasty, but everyone [crew and actors] pulled together."

Camels of Nahor, a fictional film, a sort of Romeo and Juliet about a secular Jewish man who falls in love with a rabbi's daughter, was a tough film for another reason. He ended up getting sued by the rabbi of the synagogue they filmed in for misrepresenting the synagogue.

The suit got settled out of court – a resolution that Hecht is not happy with now. (Among other things, he can't show the film anywhere anymore). "If I had known then what I know now, it would have turned out different," he said. But at the time, the threat of a multi-million-dollar lawsuit was enough for him to back down and turn away from fictional films.

"I thought then that Camels of Nahor was going to be my big break, but then we got sued and it killed my aspirations to make fiction."

But Hecht has certainly not turned away from controversial films. After forming Chutzpah Productions in 1999, he directed a number of documentaries, all of which received their share of criticism.

Y.I.D., which focuses on Diaspora Jews' feelings about Israelis, was criticized by many local Jews; Chosen People, his followup about the messianic Jewish movement, annoyed some Jews for giving time to a group they don't consider "Jewish"; Not in My Name annoyed the left-wingers who called him a fascist and Disengaging Democracy, which criticized the Israeli government's handling of last year's pullout, didn't win him many friends, either.

Hecht shrugs off criticism of his films, most of which have been shown at Jewish film festivals around the world, including Warsaw where Not in My Name picked up an award.

"People said Chosen People would bring out the next Holocaust. 'How much did they [the evangelicals] pay you to make it?'

"Others said Not in My Name reminds them of The Passion of the Christ. I'm happy with the criticism. At least I know they're watching my films.

"I just give a platform to people who do exist," he says, although the community would rather we didn't hear about them.

"I try to be balanced, in as much as a documentary is always subjective, but we don't have to be. I always tell my students [Hecht teaches film part time at Seneca College] to have a balanced point of view. There are two sides to every story."

He says audiences want to see Michael Moore-style documentaries that tell people what to believe. "I am not going to do that. I document what I see and let you judge for yourself."

Hecht was born in Ashkelon, Israel, and immigrated to Canada with his parents when he was 11. He was always interested in telling stories, and his parents bought him a video camera. "They thought it would be a nice hobby for me and it would keep me occupied."

As a teenager, Hecht worked at Rogers Community Television and then went to Seneca College School of Communication Arts. In addition to teaching there now, he also works as a producer at bpm:tv, a Canadian dance and electronic music specialty channel.

All his films are self-funded. "With Chutzpah Productions I only make enough money to make the next movie. Really, the only profitable one was Qassam [a film about the missile launches into Sderot]."

Since Hecht films, writes, directs, edits and produces his documentaries, he saves a lot of money. "I don't want to make it sound like it's just me, me, me, though. I work with a great collection of individuals, some of the best filmmakers around. I have people in Israel who help me. We work together very well. They've been very good to me over the years."

Hecht started Chutzpah Productions with Ron Furman (who has since left,) to make films based solely on Israel, Judaism and the Middle East.

"I find Judaism and Israel fascinating," he said. "I am obsessed with it. I am very connected to Israel, I visit it at least once a year. I really love that place. There are many stories to tell.

"Chutzpah Productions picks topics that no one else likes to tell. Messianic Judaism, for instance, no one else did that."

Although he does work on other, non-Jewish projects, "with Chutzpah Productions, I just want to stick to Jewish contemporary topics."

And though he isn't bothered by the criticism, Hecht is thinking about being less controversial in future projects.

"I want to shy away a bit from the 'controversial' label," he said. "I am still going to make political films, but I want to explore Israeli culture as well. Not too many people realize that Israel has a more vibrant scene than Canada."

One of his next projects is Israeli Nightlife. "It is so not Chutzpah Productions," he says with a grin. "It's about Israeli clubs, DJs, music and hot-looking people from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. This is what Israel is about – it has such a vibrant scene, and not one you see often."

He says many people don't realize that Israel is such a normal country. "Here, in Canada, clubs are closing at 2 a.m. There they open at 2 a.m. There's dancing on tables, people dress so nicely. People don't have that image of Israel."

Filmmaker Igal Hecht by the security fence in Abu Dis, just outside Jerusalem.

He's also making a film about Canadians making aliyah. "Not a controversial topic at all."

Recently, he was at the March of the Living and was commissioned to do a documentary for the organizers. "I was privileged to do it for them. It's a very powerful experience. My first and hopefully not last documentary on the Holocaust."

But don't fret. Hecht isn't completely shying away from controversial topics. After Not in My Name, which focused on the Israeli left-wing groups, Hecht is also working on Promised Land, which focuses on right-wing Judaism. "The right is going to learn about themselves," he says. "They're going to see see what they're saying about Israel."

Hecht doesn't like to pigeonhole himself into belonging to one group or the other, saying he considers himself moderate.

"Some days I'm on the left, other days I'm on the right. I just want Israel to be safe and secure."

Over the years he has spent some time with Palestinians. "I don't think the majority of them are terrorists, but at the same time there's a lot of people filled with hatred."

He remembers vividly a conversation he had with one Palestinian. "He said, 'The Jewish blood will flow outside the city of Jerusalem.'"

But at the same time, he believes, it is always innocent people who are being killed. "The leaders don't have to live with the consequences of their actions."

Hecht says his strength is that he's always willing to listen to different opinions. "I don't have a narrow mind. It's not just black or white. There is so much grey in the middle."

Another upcoming project is Resolution 50, about the Canadian Union of Public Employees boycott of Israel. "I spoke with [Ontario CUPE leader] Sid Ryan who is unfairly portrayed as an anti-Semite. He isn't," Hecht says. "He just isn't fully aware of the impact of what the resolution says."

Hecht is also working on Chutzpah TV, a series of shorts that will be aired on his website. [www.chutzpaproductions.com] "I want to be The CJN of tomorrow," he says with a laugh. "I want to do stories on our community – campus life, etc. I will explore issues and upload them into five- or 10-minute documentaries and put them online."

He believes this will be educational for his viewers and for him. "We can learn a lot from our community. The best education I got was from doing my films. I've spoken to so many people over the past few years, well over 1,000, from politicians to terrorists to everyday Canadians."

Chutzpah TV is still a work in progress, and meanwhile he's excited about a deal he's struck with CTS Television, which will be showing six of his films over the next two years on its Israel Today program. Hecht's Disengaging Democracy, a stirring look at last year's pullout from Gaza, is scheduled to open up the new season of Israel Today, the Sunday after Yom Kippur.

"I'm a workaholic," he says. "I love doing this. I wouldn't say it's a hobby, but it is fun."

A full version of Qassam plus selected scenes from his other features can be viewed on his website.

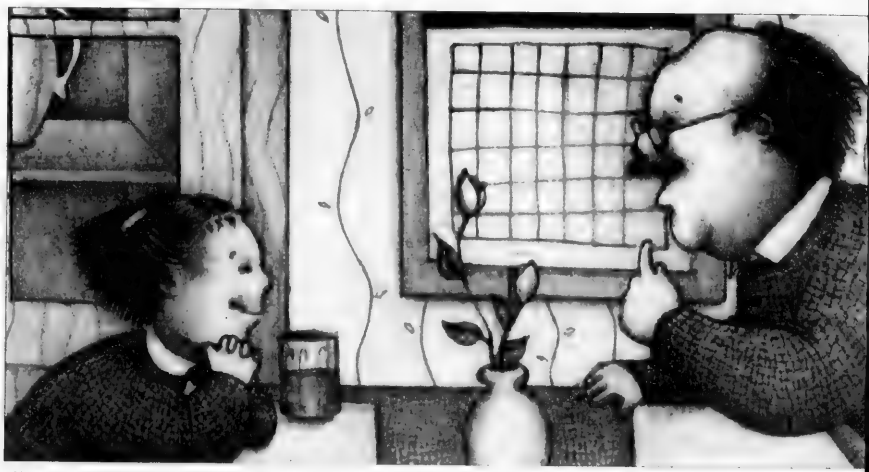
Changing places

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



Did you ever wish you could change places with someone else? Most of us have. After all, it is easy to think that your life is really ordinary and boring, and that someone else's is more fun, more exciting or even more important.

That's what happens in Bea & Mr. Jones, by Amy Schwartz (Harcourt, 2006).

Beatrice is fed up with kindergarten. She is tired of beanbag games, clothespin games and "sitting on that dumb green rug and playing that dumb coloured lollipop game."

Her father, Mr. Jones, tells her that he is fed up with his job in an advertising firm. "I'm tired of running for the 7:45!

I'm tired of sitting at that desk and working so hard! I'm tired of laughing at the boss's jokes all day."

(Your parents can tell you that when you have a job, it is a very good idea to keep on the boss's good side – by laughing at his or her jokes, for example).

Both Bea and Mr. Jones think that the other person's life sounds pretty good. They decide to change places for a day.

Bea puts on her father's jacket and tie, and picks up his briefcase. Mr. Jones puts on sneakers and turns cartwheels.

Bea catches the 7:45 a.m. commuter train, and her father meets the kindergarten teacher, Miss Seymour.

Mr. Jones does very well in kindergarten. The teacher tells him he is almost as smart as the class genius. He is the milk and cookie monitor and helps out at recess. In fact, he becomes the teacher's pet.

Bea has a wonderful time at the office. She thinks the boss's jokes are hilarious – she doesn't even have to pretend that she likes them. She als comes up with a wonderful advertising song for Crumbl Crackers that everyone thinks is terrific. The boss gives h a promotion.

What do you think happens then? Most stories like th end with the people realizing that they really prefer their ow lives and their own way of doing things.

That's not what happens in Bea & Mr. Jones. Both of ther are very happy to stay in their new lives.

Naturally, this is just a story, and a very funny one. But it fun to think about what might happen if you changed place with your mother, father, brother or sister, or anyone else.

The Alarm

David crept stealthily through the dense underbrush, hugging the ground. The enemy knew he was there. He had to escape. Now. His gun was at the ready, but he hoped against hope that he wouldn't have to use it. He was almost out of the forest now, a few more minutes and he would be safe. He cautiously looked up, and without warning, gunfire erupted all around him. An ambush! Desperately, David opened fire, but he was hopelessly outnumbered.

"David!" called a distant voice.

It was his mother.

David pressed pause and looked up from the computer.

"I asked you twice already to take out the garbage, and it's still sitting there in the kitchen. And your room. Look at it!"

"Oh, c'mon Mom, it's summer vacation. I'm supposed to be having a break."

"And during the rest of the year?"

"Well, during school I have so much homework every day!"

"I see," she said, with obvious displeasure.

"Fine. I'll do it soon. Okay?"

"That's what you said yesterday, remember?" She sighed. "I have to go make breakfast. Please, please take care of what I asked you to do."

The door closed, and David resumed the game. Explosions rocked the forest as he fought for his life. Finally, he breathed, relieved. The last of his attackers fell before him. He glanced at his health status: GRIM. The assault had left him severely wounded. He had to find a health potion soon. Suddenly, the air raid siren went off. Air raid siren? That never happens in this game! It's not from the computer! It's coming from downstairs! Maybe it's the smoke detector. Maybe there's a fire!

David dashed down the stairs, his heart pounding.

Dad was standing there, blowing his shofar, while Mom listened attentively.

So that's what it was.

"Good morning David," said Dad.

"Good morning. Uh, why are you blowing your shofar now? Rosh Hashanah isn't for awhile...I think."

"You're right, David. Rosh Hashanah isn't for another month, but today is the first day of the month of Elul. During Elul, we prepare ourselves for Rosh Hashanah, and to make sure we don't forget, we blow the shofar in synagogue every day. So I figured I would blow it for Mom also."

"You really had me scared for a minute. I thought it was an alarm or something."

"Funny you should say that. The Rambam compares the shofar to an alarm."

"Really?"

Dad went over to the bookcase, removing a slim volume. "Hmm it should be here. Nope. Maybe no, not here either. Where could it be? Oh, found it! It's in his discussion of Teshuvah, repentance, in chapter 3. 'An allusion can be found in the shofar's call: Wake up, sleeping ones; rouse yourselves from your slumber. All of you who have lost track of what's truly important and waste your lives away, recall what you should be doing and improve your ways.'" Dad paused. "See, a wake-up call, an alarm, just like you said."

Mom smiled. "David, what do you think the shofar is telling you?"

"I don't know...oh!"

David headed for the kitchen and emerged with the garbage.

"Wonderful. I'm very proud of you. Now, are you ready for some pancakes?"

David ate breakfast quickly. He couldn't wait to get back to his game. But when he returned to the computer, a gloomy message awaited him: GAME OVER.

I can't believe it! I forgot to pause it when I ran downstairs! And I was so close to completing the mission. All that for nothing!

The voice of the shofar echoed in his head: "All of you who waste your lives away."

He really wanted to start a new game, but first he had something else to do.

David bent over, and started tidying up his room.

Five minutes a day...by Rosh Hashanah, it would be clean.

AGO TO EXHIBIT PHOTOGRAPHS BY ANSEL ADAMS AND ALFRED EISENSTAEDT

The Art Gallery of Ontario celebrates the outstanding work of renowned photographers Ansel Adams (1902-1984) and Alfred Eisenstaedt (1898-1995) in two related exhibitions this fall, beginning Nov. 18.

The exhibitions examine the extraordinary careers of Adams and Eisenstaedt and highlight some of their most iconic images.

Organized by the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, the Adams exhibition will include 125 photographs spanning the American master's 50-year career. An exhibition of approximately 65 photographs by Alfred Eisenstaedt is being planned as a complement to the Adams show.

Eisenstaedt developed his candid style of photography in Germany in the late 1920s and '30s. Many of his photographs chronicled prewar Europe and were published in popular picture magazines. They attracted attention by capturing the lives of ordinary people engaged in cultural activities and vivid everyday moments. In America, Eisenstaedt became a renowned photographer for Life magazine; his realistic style contributed to the foundation of modern photojournalism.

The AGO owns more than 400 Eisenstaedt photographs as part of the huge Klinsky Agency collection that was donated as an anonymous gift. Key supporters of the Eisenstaedt exhibition are Brenda Coleman Milrad and Toronto arts lawyer Aaron Milrad.

Names in the News: As reported in this space, Michael Redhill's play Goodness made its European première in August at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe. The play, which deals with genocide and morality, apparently impressed audiences, critics and prize juries. "I doubt if there will be a more gripping theatrical experience than Goodness at Edinburgh this year," wrote Lynne Walker in the Independent.

Michael Redhill

It won the Fringe First Award and was one of only five works nominated for the Carol Tambor Award ("Best of Edinburgh Award") out of more than 1,000 festival entries. As a result of the Fringe prize, it is to be performed for a 10-day run in Manhattan next March.

Redhill is a Toronto-based writer best known for the acclaimed novel Martin Sloane, published by Doubleday in 2001. He's also editor of the literary journal Brick.

Music in Exile: The Royal Conservatory of Music presents Music in Exile, a weekend of rarely heard music by composers exiled by the Nazis, performed by ARC, the conservatory's resident musical ensemble. The program includes works of several Jewish composers including Mieszyslaw Weinberg, who fled Warsaw for the Soviet Union in 1939.

Also included is the Canadian première of Through Roses, an acclaimed work by American pianist-composer Marc Neikrug, who is to conduct. Born in 1946, Neikrug is a longtime accompanist to violinist-conductor Pinchas Zukerman. Through Roses, which blends music and dramatic text, has been translated into many languages and performed all over the world.

Pinchas Zukerman

Music in Exile also features lectures by musicologist Albrecht Dumling and Bret Werb of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. Glenn Gould Studio, 250 Front St. W. Oct. 14 and 15. 416-408-2824, ext. 321

Film retraces Levi's post-Auschwitz trip through Europe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When the Red Army liberated the Auschwitz concentration camp on Jan. 27, 1945, one of the inmates who suddenly regained his freedom was a young Italian Jewish chemist named Primo Levi, who would one day be a towering literary figure in Italy.

Having been freed, Levi embarked on a tortuous 10-month trip through the war-torn, shattered landscape of eastern Europe. It would lead him back to his home in Turin after countless detours and delays.

Primo Levi

In Primo Levi's Journey – which is due to be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 12 at 9 a.m. and again on Sept. 14 at 10 a.m. – director Davide Ferrario and writer Marco Belpoliti retrace his steps through Poland, Ukraine, Belarus, Moldova, Romania, Hungary, Slovakia, Austria, Germany and Italy.

A road movie in the classic sense of the word, it opens with a shot of Auschwitz in the dead of winter and a description, in Levi's own prose, of his bedraggled fellow inmates on the day they were finally released.

As the 92-minute documentary unfolds, Levi is seen, in a 1984 clip, returning to Auschwitz on a brief visit to mark the 39th anniversary of his liberation. Three years later, he committed suicide, never having shaken the trauma of his incarceration.

In re-enacting his odyssey, the filmmakers take us to places he passed and wrote about in two critically-acclaimed books, If This Is a Man and The Truce. These scenes are supplemented by file footage of World War II, which gives the film a certain historical perspective.

But in reconstructing Levi's adventure, they also portray current conditions in what was the Soviet empire. And so they come full circle, even if the relevance of all these scenes is questionable.

Filming in Poland, they interview the great Polish film director Andrzej Wajda and visit an empty steel mill near Krakow.

Moving on to newly independent Ukraine, they talk to American missionaries, observe the ruins of a Soviet gulag and enter the ghost town of Prypiat, which was evacuated after the 1986 Chernobyl nuclear disaster.

In Belarus, a war widow remembers her husband – a partisan killed in 1944 – and the director of a collective farm drones on about his job. His words are juxtaposed against the backdrop of an old-style Soviet propaganda film extolling the virtues of communism.

Moldova, possibly the poorest nation in Europe today, is portrayed as a lush, pastoral land.

In Romania, the camera pans on a watermelon vendor hawking his goods on the side of a road, on two men rowing across the Danube River and on the interior of an Italian-owned garment factory.

Alluding to the mass movements of people caused by globalization, Ferrario films Vietnamese and Chinese merchants in Hungary.

And in Austria and Germany, he respectively visits the rustic town where Adolf Hitler was born and chats with a bunch of neo-Nazis spouting their racist vision of a new Europe.

Last but not least, Levi's friend Mario Rigoni Stern reminisces about him in a mountainous setting in Italy.

As the film rèaches its denouement in Turin, where Levi lived before and after the war, Ferrrario quotes a line from one of Levi's books: "Nothing is true outside the lager."

Tragically, for Levi, life was never as intense after the random terror and uncertainty of Auschwitz.

Documentary explores Ashkenazic identity, culture in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

At a time when Israel is so preoccupied with Lebanon, it is refreshing, even therapeutic, to dwell on a far different topic.

Ashkenaz, the Festival of New Yiddish Culture which wound up last week, gave us that opportunity at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

There, at the Al Green Theatre, we were treated to an unusual film from Israel, The Ashkenazim.

Directed by the Ashkenazi and Sephardi husband-and-wife team of Dani Dothan and Dalia Mevorach, this funny and altogether charming 52-minute documentary broadly deals with the issue of Ashkenazi identity in the Jewish state.

More to the point, the movie, which was co-presented with the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is about a small but relatively young group of Israelis who have discovered their Ashkenazi roots and celebrate them.

In some circles, this quest seems politically incorrect, since it goes against the classic Zionist grain of downplaying ethnic differences.

But in The Ashkenazim, which was watched by an appreciative crowd, Dothan and Mevorach ignore this imperative and explore an intriguing facet of Israeli society that dogmatic Zionist theoreticians would, I strongly suspect, rather sweep under the rug.

Their film unfolds through the medium of absorbing interviews with 20something and 30 something Israelis trying to connect with their parents' and grandparents' rich cultural heritage.

He is the founder and chief promoter of The Movement for Ashkenazic Identity. Though its membership is minuscule, Assaf talks as if he is on the cusp of a new millennium.

Another interesting figure is an intense, olive-complexioned man who jettisoned his quintessential Hebrew surname, Ben-Canaan, so that he could reclaim his original Ashkenazi surname, Handelman.

He and his Russian fiancee, Olga, have returned to their roots and are proud of their Friday night Sabbath dinners.

Not surprisingly, the culinary dimensions of Ashkenazi culture are explored in some depth.

In this connection, the filmmakers focus on a man who has achieved expertise and satisfaction in the preparation of cheese dumplings, a famous Austrian dish his mother and grandmother perfected to a fine art.

In fleshing out their theme, Dothan and Mevorach also explore Ashkenazi/Sephardi tensions in contemporary Israel, but they do so with levity.

Patricia, an Ashkenazi ballet dancer who has taken up Oriental belly dancing, boasts that she can move her body with "the best of them."

A woman of Ashkenazi descent whose name I missed tells an uproarious story of how her grandmother reacted to the news that her granddaughter would soon marry a Moroccan Jew.

Dothan recognizes that the current interest in Ashkenazi identity may be nothing more than a passing fad.

During a question-and-answer session after the screening of the film, he said, "We're Israelis. We have our own culture, which is neither Ashkenazi nor Sephardi. We're a melting pot."

He could not have said it better.

Beth Hatefutsoth – the World Center for Jewish Peoplehood

By GAIL LICHTMAN
(IPS)

BETH HATEFUTSOTH, Tel Aviv —The Nahum Goldman Museum of the Jewish Diaspora in Tel Aviv is poised to be renamed the World Center for Jewish Peoplehood, following a law passed by the Knesset in December 2005 that confers the status of "a national institute for Jewish communities worldwide" on the museum.

The new law comes at a time of changing Jewish realities, when unparalleled assimilation rates, intermarriage and waning individual and collective Jewish identity threaten the Jewish people. The world centre will serve as a powerful force in forging a vibrant, unified Jewish people and fostering knowledge, understanding and pride.

In anticipation, the museum, in the capable hands of its new dynamic director, Hasia Israeli, is now gearing up for a process of renewal and revival to meet its new status. "This," said Israeli, "will involve turning the museum's face more towards Jewish education and adding the latest in modern technology and visual effects, without changing its existing concept of providing an emotional and personal, as well as intellectual, journey through Jewish history."

A group of schoolchildren visiting Beth Hatefutsoth in the framework of the School of Jewish Peoplehood Studies, view a wall painting depicting Jewish physician and statesman Hisdai Ibn Shaprut (915-975) receiving sages and poets in his garden. Shaprut helped launch the Hebrew revival in Spain.

In order to realize this renewal, Beth Hatefutsoth has embarked on a capital campaign aimed at raising $12 million over three years. The museum has already received $2 million from the Claims Conference Against Germany, as well as the backing of the Israeli government. The government initially pledged full matching of donor gifts but due to the war in Lebanon, museum officials are no longer certain of full matching, although they do anticipate continued government participation.

In 2004, Israeli businessman Leonid Nevzlin, chairman of the museum's newly established board of governors, pledged a donation of $5 million over five years to the institution, and recently added a gift of $1 million toward upgrading and renovating the galleries of the permanent exhibit. "It is essential for the Jewish people to have a cultural institution that transcends our differences and brings us together in peoplehood," he stated.

Yefet Ozery, director of resource development and overseas relations at Beth Hatefutsoth, said that "Mr. Nevzlin's generosity has made it possible for us to expand, to develop, to reach out to communities, to offer programming and to do many other things."

Founded in 1978, Beth Hatefutsoth was one of the first Jewish museums in the world. It presents the saga of 2,500 years of Jewish dispersion, during which the indomitable spirit of the Jewish people succeeded in preserving a shared heritage and common destiny despite vast differences in language, geography and culture.

Some 100,000 visitors a year, including many youth groups from Israel and abroad, pass through its journey, which is presented through six thematic galleries, each one representing a facet that safeguarded the Jewish people throughout history. The galleries focus on family, community, faith, culture, life among the nations and the return to Zion.

In addition to the museum's permanent collection, Beth Hatefutsoth has amassed one of the world's most impressive database collections and visual documentation of Jewish cultural treasures and Jewish life in the Diaspora. The upgrading project includes digitizations of the data and making it accessible to visitors through user-friendly computer terminals throughout the museum.

The renewal will focus on upgrading and redesigning the permanent exhibition to include interactive, state-of-the-art multimedia technology. Looking ahead, Beth Hatefutsoth is in the process of establishing a new wing, to be housed in the existing Spiegel building, which will showcase the accomplishments and challenges of contemporary Jewry.

The biggest innovation involves the establishment of the School of Jewish Peoplehood, which gives the museum a new educational direction aimed at curricula and content development, teachers and educators, young adults and academics.

"The school's objective is to impart knowledge and understanding about the Jewish people, encourage pride in the Jewish heritage and address the dilemmas of Jewish life in modern times," says Hasia Israeli.

Working with Kivunim (Directions), the largest Israel-based professional development program in the Jewish educational world, the school has created a program for educators from Israel and the United States that, according to former program participant Anileen Gray, creates "an intellectual, spiritual and emotional experience that establishes a bond between those teaching in Jewish schools and the Land of Israel."

Steps are also being taken to create an Integrated Multimedia Center within the world centre that will merge and integrate all of the museum's current and future digital databases – the two million individuals listed in the Jewish Genealogy Center, the photo-documentation of Jewish communal life in the Visual Documentation Center, the extensive collection of Jewish music in the Music Center, and the thousands of entries in the Jewish family names and present database and the past Jewish communities in the Diaspora database.

The information from the Multimedia Information Center will be incorporated into a global Jewish Internet communication network.

The new centre aspires to reflect the uniqueness and diversity of the Jewish people throughout history, while at the same time emphasizing its unity. And as always, Beth Hatefutsoth looks forward – in the words of one of its founders, Jewish resistance fighter and poet Abba Kovner – to continuing to encourage the Jewish people "to remember the past, to live the present and to trust in the future."

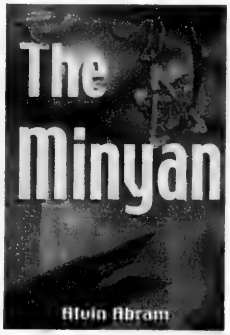
Abram's latest crime novel features hard-boiled cop

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

As a volunteer for the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation, the organization created by filmmaker Steven Spielberg, author Alvin Abram gained first-hand knowledge of the experiences of Holocaust survivors.

In his recently published seventh book, The Minyan, Abram combines his flare for detective crime mysteries with a story about the Holocaust, featuring locales in Toronto and many other parts of the world.

The Minyan, a 428-page soft-cover book, is Abrams' second novel in a trilogy centred around Det. Gabe Garshowitz, a hard-boiled, arthritic, 30-year veteran of the Toronto police force who is partnered with Det. Iris Forester, an attractive divorcee half his age.



The novel is a mystery in which reporter Rachel Ackerman follows up on a journal that purports to tell the story of 10 Holocaust survivors who pledge to kill 10 people who were in Birkenau and who the journal says don't deserve to live.

At the same time, not realizing his case is linked to Ackerman's journal, Garshowitz and Forester are investigating the discovery of 30-year-old bones found in a home that is about to be demolished on Euclid Avenue in Toronto.

Abram, a 70-year old author, speaker, businessman and award-winning volunteer, has lived with Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD) since childhood. A graphic designer by trade, he has also overcome numerous life-threatening events, including five heart attacks, and has coped with his wife Marilyn's battle with cancer.

Yet, he shows no signs of losing his enthusiasm for life, or his late-in-life emergence as an award winning author.

"In 1995, after I had a severe heart attack, my wife asked me if I had any regrets," he said.

"I said that I regretted not going back to school, as I was a high school dropout and I had stories in my head and didn't know how to write them. Without telling me, she enrolled me at York University in a fourth-year writing course, and now the rest is history."

His previously published books include Why Zaida?, The Light After The Dark (parts 1 and 2), The Unlikely Victims, An Eye For An Eye and the anthology Stories I Wrote.

He said his interest in literature came partly from his father, Herman Abramovitz, who was the editor of Vochenblatt, a workers' newspaper published in Yiddish.

But he also credits his mother, Annie Abramovitz, who worked in a Spadina Avenue sweatshop, with inspiring him. She once told her young son, "Never forget your dreams. But you must learn to live in today's world as well. Maybe, someday, you'll be able to use your gift so everyone can enjoy your dreams."

Abram's books are available at bookstores throughout Canada, or via e-mail at bubbameinsa@yahoo.com.

Genealogist explores her family's history

Jews settled in Stropkov, in the Slovak Republic, around 1640.

It was a little town in the backwoods of Slovakia with a Jewish atmosphere because it was between Galicia and Hungary and thus attracted Jews fleeing from those two areas.

On May 24, 1942, the day before the Nazis began to deport Jews, the records indicate that there were some 2,240 Jews in Stropkov.

American-born amateur genealogist Melody Amsel, now living in Israel, whose family lived in Stropkov, researched her family's history. Some of Amsel's family immigrated to America in the early 1930s, but most of her relatives perished in the Holocaust.

However, what began as a yizkor (Holocaust) book for Amsel's family went far beyond. Amsel's research led to her publishing the book Between Galicia and Hungary: The Jews of Stropkov, about her family and the Jews of the Stropkov community, from before World War II to the 162 known survivors after the war.

In compiling the book, written in English and Hebrew, Amsel was assisted by Toronto's Maurice Kulik, whose family lived in Stropkov for several generations. Kulik himself was born in Stropkov and lost many of his family members in the Shoah.

He became acquainted with Amsel while searching for information on Stropkov on the Jewish genealogy website in 1998.

Amsel and Kulik decided to collaborate on research, and after more than 3,000 e-mails went back and forth between them and interviews with survivors were conducted, Kulik helped Amsel publish Between Galicia and Hungary and distribute it to the survivors who were interviewed and to selected libraries throughout the world.

The Jews of Stropkov and of neighbouring communities prior to the war fill 64 pages of the 352-page book. The identified survivors are listed among them in boldface type.

There are numerous interviews in Between Galicia and Hungary, and the book includes more than 100 photographs of the Jews of Stropkov, some taken by a Christian photographer during the deportations.

The book's launch took place in Bar Ilan, Israel, and was attended by the current chief rabbi of Stropkov, the Stropkov community now living in Israel and family members, and members of the famous Halberstram rabbinic hierarchy of Stropkov.

In an interview with The CJN, Kulik recalled his family's escape from Stropkov when he was a small child. "My sister and I were carried through the forest by Gypsies who were used as household aids," he said.

The historian Sir Martin Gilbert, Sir Winston Churchill's official biographer, told Amsel, "I must say I am very impressed by what you have done and hope that the book will find its way to every Holocaust library. You are really to be congratulated for a very fine achievement."

For more information, call Maurice Kulik at 905-731-0242 or visit www.avotaynu.com/books/stropkov.htm.

A meditation on memory from the heart

I Was A Child of Holocaust Survivors* by Bernice Eisenstein, McClelland & Stewart Ltd.

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

There is an incisive, elegant aphorism in Jewish tradition about the nature of interpersonal communication: That which springs from the heart, finds its way to the heart.

Bernice Eisenstein

Our sages and ancient folklorists could have had in mind Bernice Eisenstein's book, I Was A Child of Holocaust Survivors, when they expressed that poignant truth. For the book is a uniquely gripping articulation of the heart that resonates with the knowing reader with strings of aching sorrow.

Eisenstein's book is a memoir that recalls her parents, their circle of friends, the home, the milieu and the culture in which she and her siblings were raised in the immediate aftermath of World War II, more particularly, in the immediate aftermath of her parents' survival of Adolf Hitler's attempt to annihilate them and the rest of European Jewry. But it is more than a memoir. The book is akin to a personal excursion into the nature and phenomenon of memory. In fact, the author describes her book along those lines.

"The work is an extended meditation to try to find my way, as honestly as I could, to reflect on memory," Eisenstein told The CJN recently in a downtown coffee shop.

Early in the book, Eisenstein writes: "My parents arrived in a new country draped in loss, with their memories deprived of the ability to offer comfort.

"Even though the past was something my parents tried to keep at a distance from their children, out of harm's reach, it inevitably shadowed the landscape in which we would grow."

Carefully, candidly and quite lovingly, Eisenstein depicts for the reader, through a meticulous blending of various literary and artistic devices – prose, poetry, simple illustration and textured drawing – the many emotional promontories and tearful valleys of that scarred but life-sustaining landscape in which she and her siblings took their first steps.

The geography in which these new immigrants planted the flag of their new lives and their new homes was the Kensington Market area of Toronto in the late 1940s and early '50s.

Eisenstein is especially adept in the way she captures the sights, sounds and smells of that Yiddish-speaking enclave in the very British post-war Toronto.

"Kensington Market is my babysitter, while my father and mother are in their shop just around the corner, plucking feathers from chickens…

"Across the street is the cheese emporium, displaying giant wheels of cheese in the window. From the market's small, narrow stores, all creased one on top of the other, everything can be purchased. Fish fresh from a tank or scaled and filleted, chicken plucked and trussed or sectioned into parts, barrels of herring – brined and pickled – barrels of pickles – brined and pickle-pickled – bagels, braided breads, rye bread, with or without kimmel, black bread, with or without raisins, and a cornucopia spill of fruit, vegetables and nuts. Shopkeepers wear long white aprons, which are stained with the colours of their wares by hands wiping off blood from freshly killed poultry, meat and fish or the pigmented juice of overripe fruit. Chickens, trying to cheat fate, can be seen roaming the concrete sidewalks and streets that might as well have been made of the straw and mud of the past."

Eisenstein's descriptions are so rich that the reader can close his eyes and almost sense himself stepping onto the pavement of that raucous, chaotic, effervescent neighbourhood of newcomers and old European ways.

Indeed, there are many powerful, descriptive and evocative passages in the book. The author conveys the visual sense of her upbringing as seen through the eyes of a growing child, but interprets the various compelling scenes and snapshots of time past through the understanding heart of a mature adult.

For example, in coming to grips with her limitations in trying to relate to her parents' silent pain, she writes: "I had always felt that if I could find my parents' deepest hurt, I could locate my own grief for them. But how could I have ever imagined that everything the Holocaust had voided in their lives could be replaced, as if my need to understand could somehow make up for such sorrow? I will never be able to know the truth of what my parents had experienced. It is beyond my reach, and perhaps even theirs, to know the full extent of their loss."

Sipping coffee with Eisenstein in the ease and breeze of a warm summer day, one immediately notices her dedication to precise, careful expression, to always finding just the right word, phrase or other method of depiction to accurately convey the full, nuanced meaning of her thoughts.

Artistry and creative expression have been Eisenstein's calling from a very early age. Oil painting became her pastime as a young child. Then the pastime became a vocation, which she joyfully joined to the study of English.

She received an honours degree in English literature at York University and then returned to painting in Israel and in England. In 1977, Eisenstein returned to Canada; freelancing as an editor and illustrator, but always drawing and painting.

I Was A Child of Holocaust Survivors "was actually triggered by drawings of [her] father some five years ago," Eisenstein told The CJN. "I never set out to write a book. But the process had its own magic.

"There is a stage in the writing and creative process at which you do not turn back," she said emphatically.

"The words and the drawings in the book were always meant to go together. They are mirror images, knitted together," Eisenstein explained.

The resulting fabric and the many mirror images that Eisenstein has knit together is an emotional and esthetic triumph. "Nothing is by happenstance in this book. Even every technical aspect of the layout, assembly and design of the book is particularly planned."

"Even the binding," Eisenstein pointed out, "and the 'ghosts' [the faint silvery impressions of the faces of individuals mentioned in the book] on the inside of the covers are deliberate."

I Was A Child of Holocaust Survivors is a wide canvas depicting the bittersweet experiences of the Holocaust survivors as newcomers in Canada and the complicated relationships between the survivors and their children. Eisenstein has deftly painted her meditation on memory and the family that pours into her memories in bold colours, while reflecting on the meaning of books, the Yiddish language, the special group of her parents' friends, her mother's taped testimony of Holocaust experiences and more.

Examples of Eisenstein's casually expressed, yet penetrating insights abound. For example, speaking about her parents' special circle of friends, she writes: "I have come to understand, in a way less known than felt, something of what my parents and their friends have meant to one another, and realize why it had always been impossible for me not to have sensed myself an outsider."

About her father's death, she abruptly expresses the feeling felt by anyone who has ever been at the bedside of a dying parent. "My father died that morning and the day somehow continued without him."

I Was A Child of Holocaust Survivors has been translated into a number of languages, including Dutch, Italian, French and Spanish and will be sold in a number of countries.

And that is all to the good, for it is sure to reach, in profound and inspiring ways, many of the individuals who take the time to read it, for as our sages told us, "That which springs from the heart, finds its way to the heart."

PANAMA – MORE PROFITABLE THAN OIL

Advertising Feature

Eleonora Michailov

If you were to consult with any real estate expert as to which part of the world experiences the fastest real estate growth, you would collectively hear only one response, Central America. The major tourist industry in the region has stimulated an unprecedented economic boom, development and investment projects of enormous proportions.

Panoramic views of such countries as Costa Rica, Dominican Republic and Panama are beautifully decorated with high rise luxurious condominiums and hotel buildings. However, Panama has always positively stood out from its economically unstable neighboring countries in the region with an official domestic currency of the US dollar and solid economy that continues to flourish and grow.

To encourage foreign investment, the Panamanian government provides many lucrative incentives to investors, and most importantly, a solid legal system to protect the investment and the investor. Panama City, the capital of Panama, is a very unique place in the world. The canal that is located nearby connects two oceans, and as a result, Panamanians enjoy a vast selection of goods that pass through the ports at very low prices.

Due to its solid economic state, Panama City proudly carries the title as the second financial capital of the world following Switzerland. Over 100 different banks from all over the world have operations in Panama. All this in addition to fabulous climate and near zero crime rates makes Panama an ideal destination for investment and retirement.

"Panama is currently experiencing a major real estate boom with very elite and luxurious projects", says Elenora Michailov, an exclusive representative of a leading Panamanian real estate corporation known as HOMES.

Major developers from Europe and United States of America fight over permits for land development in Panama City. One of the most architecturally beautiful and unique luxury condominium projects "Faros de Panama", which is being built by a Spanish group, is going to be erected on a preferred and prestigious ocean front property in Panama City. On the lower levels of this magnificent complex there will be the convenience of a five star hotel, a major shopping centre and a casino. Located on the upper floors will be luxury ocean view condominiums. As a result of the extraordinary demand for the units, the construction on this astonishing project is set to commence at the end of this year.

"Investments into Panamanian real estate are an ideal and smart way for capital growth", says Mrs. Michailov. It is evident that the Panamanian real estate market is just at the beginning stages of a major growth cycle and would continue on its path for at least additional two to three years.

Panama's worldwide popularity makes the country a top choice for a heaven-like place for a dream retirement, which is supported by surveys conducted annually by reputable business publications. Panama is an ideal place to reside in for people of all ages, but in particular, Panama is very generous and kind to the retirees. Thanks to government legislation, many goods, top quality medical and dental care, among other services, are reduced in price for retirees, thus making Panama an ideal place to spend one's relaxing retirement years.

Recently, many Canadians have expressed very strong interest in Panama for both investment and retirement opportunities. For many, Panama City is a close twin of Miami with gorgeous new condos and office buildings, prestigious yacht clubs, major shopping centres and casinos, and all that on a stunning Pacific Ocean shore. There is, however, a major difference between the two cities, the price. For example, a one square foot ocean view luxury condo would cost one from 170 to 300 USD, which is much cheaper than in Miami.

"There is no need to be a millionaire to purchase and yield high returns on investment" says Elenora. "The secret behind wise investment", shares Mrs. Michailov, "is to establish a corporation and acquire property through it. By doing so, one is avoiding a mandatory 2% tax called "land transfer tax" and would not pay property taxes for 15 years in all newly constructed projects. A purchase of an ocean front condominium unit would require down payment of 30% (paid in 3 installments of 10%) throughout the year.

As a result, with an investment of only 30% you can become an owner of an exclusive luxury ocean view condominium in Panama City. It is not unusual for buyers to enjoy a return of as high as 100% if not more than their initial investment of 10% ($30,000) if they choose to sell their property" says Elenora.

Just recently, she continues, two of my clients have bought luxury condo units by investing only 40,000 USD. The value of their property rose so high that if they were to choose to sell the units now, they could easily yield a profit of 100,000 USD. Although for many these numbers seem to be astronomical, they are indeed true due to a major local and worldwide demand for property in Panama.

"There is more to look forward to in the near future" says Elenora. The government is due to release a major project regarding the expansion of the Panamanian Canal estimated at close to $8 billion US. This without doubt would further fuel the local economy by creating new jobs and increase follow of goods.

Colon, a free trade region in Panama (world's second largest after Hong Kong) annually yields the Panamanians budget an astonishing $9 billion US in profits. This free trade zone is also positively reflected on locals as well due to tax free goods. For example a pound of bananas cost only 13 cents. And a popular Chilean wine that costs in Canada over 10 dollars is only a fifth of the price in Panama. To further exemplify, a dinner for two in a well established restaurant with a bottle of wine would cost one roughly 20 USD which cannot even be compared with the Canadians or USA prices. And finally, a brand name big screen high definition television set is priced half the price seen on the Canadian market.

The strong Jewish community within Panama City and such streets as Via Israel make any Jewish person feel welcome and at home.

Many Canadians have already bought many winter properties in Panama. During the cold Canadian winters they enjoy the outstanding Panamanian climate. And during the summer time they have no difficulty renting the property to other tourists as the flow of them is continuous year round.

In order to enjoy the full scope of what Panama has to offer, a picture is worth 1000 words, says Elenora Michailov. On September 24, 2006 there would be an organized tour, accompanied by Elenora, to Panama City and the surrounding area for new buyers and investors. During the tour, attendees will be presented with a fabulous opportunity to see elite real estate projects ranging from luxury ocean front condos to villas on exclusive golf courses and meet with legal team that will be able to answer any questions that they might have.

For reservations or any additional information, kindly do not hesitate to contact the office of Elenora Michailov at 416-450-8114, www.panamareals.com

Panama offers you all the luxury; safety and life style you deserve at an affordable price.

Ceremonial pitch at Jays game 'an honour'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As you enter Samuel Salsberg's tastefully decorated apartment, you could very easily miss the pair of battered baseball gloves that lie in a heap on the marble floor, below a carved wooden console table.

Though he's closing in on 90 and he played his last serious game of baseball decades ago, Salsberg and his grandson gave the mitts a workout in anticipation of displaying once again the form that made him a pro prospect back in the 1930s.

Salsberg has been selected to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Sept. 5 Blue Jays home game against the Cleveland Indians. It comes just a few days before his 90th birthday on Sept. 8.

Shaking off the rust in a short workout in his building's squash court (they were rained out), his throwing arm soon began to feel sore. The bursitis in his shoulder that shortened his competitive baseball career was acting up again, along with the effects of a more recently torn rotator cuff.

Had the offer come 70 years ago, he might well have been able to pitch a game for the major league team. Back when he was a young player, he helped lead his playground team, the St. Andrews Saints, to several city and provincial championships. His throwing skill was so renowned, he was asked to be the practice pitcher for the minor league Toronto Maple Leafs, an affiliate of the Cincinnati Reds. He was only 17 at the time, possessed a strong arm and threw a lot of fastballs. Add that to the numerous pitches he hurled for his city team and Salsberg overdid it and, he believes, in the long run, shortened his career.

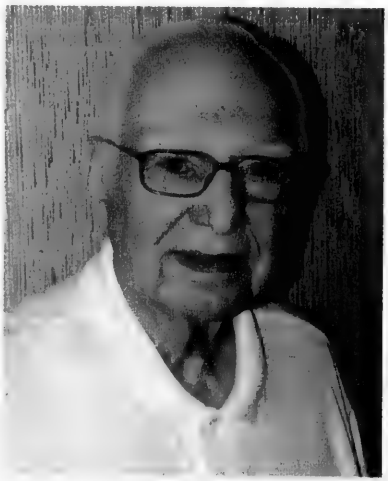
In December 1934, however, when he was still in his prime, he was offered a tryout with the major league New York Giants, which had won the World Series only a year before. Ironically, it was the 11 days he spent with the Giants at spring training in Tampa that spelled the end of his professional career.

But to digress. Before heading south to suit up for the Giants, Salsberg had received a call from the management of the Maple Leafs instructing him to come down to the Royal York Hotel to meet Larry McPhail, general manager of the Reds.

"They told me to report to Tampa for spring training and to try out professionally," he recalled.

In January, Salsberg, cousin of the late politician and community leader J.B. Salsberg, reported to Florida and started informal workouts with other prospects and pros who lived in the Sunshine State. Apparently someone liked what they saw in Salsberg and he was approached by a stranger and asked if he'd like to work out with the Giants.

Only 18 at the time, naive about player's rights and without a professional agent to represent him (there was no such animal in the '30s), Salsberg agreed. He spent 11 days in the Giants camp and at the end of that period, Salsberg recalled, a Jewish player with the Giants, Phil Weintraub, told him, "'glad you made it kid.'"



Samuel Salsberg

Unfortunately, Salsberg's freelancing did not go over well with the Maple Leafs. "The Maple Leafs found out and told me to go home," he said.

The Giants, for their part, would not break the unwritten rule about poaching other team's players.

So came an end to Salsberg's major league ambitions, though it didn't mark the end of his baseball career. He returned to Toronto and played for a time in a regional senior league. Later he moved to Kirkland Lake and played in a northern Ontario mining league, an independent semi-pro circuit that featured lots of ex-pros and top amateurs. In the heart of the Depression, it provided good money and good baseball and the newly-minted carpenter's apprentice stayed in the league until 1941, when he joined the Royal Canadian Engineers.

Later he was sent to a white collar training program and was eventually assigned as chief clerk in the army's administration wing. Salsberg was discharged in December 1945 and with a growing family to feed, he took over a cigar store at the corner of Spadina and College in what was then the heart of the Jewish community. Nearby were such landmarks as the Homestead Restaurant, the Crescent Grill and The Bagel.

The early years were tough, what with government-imposed quotas on just about every item of merchandise. It was hard to make a living when you were allotted six cases of Coke and two cases of 7UP per month, along with limited quantities of magazines, newspapers and cigarettes.

Eventually business improved, with the ticket business proving a great attraction. Even then, Maple Leafs hockey games were the top draw, though he also sold tickets for all manner of performances and even Broadway shows.

Sammy's Smoke Shop proved a great meeting place, with the likes of Wayne and Shuster, actors Lou Jacobi and Lorne Green dropping in. Another notable was Sen. David Croll, who became Salsberg's closest friend.

Salsberg gave up the business in 1985 but he never lost his love of baseball. He remains an avid Blue Jays fan and still goes to about 14 games a year. His scrapbook has plenty of memorabilia from the Jays' back to back World Series wins and he feels "it's an honour" to be asked to throw out a first pitch.

"It's a thrill," he said. "My kids arranged it because they know the love I have for the sport. I never had the opportunity to pitch major league ball. I don't know if I could have, but I had the feeling when I went down, I could've been signed. I think what could have happened had I not done what I did. I don't know.

"But my shoulder gave out early...This way, I continued on with my life."

Growing up isn't always easy

By CHAIM COHN

Guest Voice

"When are you going to grow up?" I heard this a thousand times from my mother, may she rest in peace, and then from my wife. The obvious answer is never. I could never act my age – I'm 57 – and fortunately, never tried to.

Living in Israel for almost 30 years, however, has been good for my immaturity. After all, it's a young country. But a few years ago, I discovered the ultimate address for people who can't act their age: the Israel Defence Forces has a volunteer program where people beyond the age of reserve service can volunteer for two weeks and serve in various units in the regular army with the 18- to 21-year-old soldiers.

When a friend told me about his two weeks of military service, I knew that I had found my place and immediately applied. I was accepted and underwent two days in a refresher course. I fired off a lot of bullets from an M-16, a light machine gun; and reviewed first aid, use of the field radio and other things. The army has found that older volunteers can bring some wisdom and experience that can help solve some of the everyday problems inexperienced 18- and 19-year-olds have to face. Most volunteers are stationed along the fence, which is still incomplete, between "the territories" (Judea and Samaria) and Israel proper.

Many Palestinians want to cross into Israel for employment, medical services and family visits. Soldiers have to examine their papers and check for weapons and explosives. Entry is often refused because something is not in order or out of date. The friction between the Palestinians and the soldiers is very real, and ugly incidents have occurred. It was thought that more mature and experienced people on the ground could defuse some of these tense situations.

I, however, got a different assignment and went out on patrols with the Border Police in the area of Um El Fahum, south of Afula, along the fence itself. At that time, part of the fence was constructed and part was still being built. It became immediately clear to me that without the fence, there is no control. Dozens of young men could be seen crouching in the woods, waiting for our jeep patrol to pass so that they could sneak into Israel.

Some sought employment in agriculture or construction, while others carried sacks with cheap junk made in China, which they wanted to sell, and some could have definitely been terrorists. Those were the days of the intifadah, when terrorists were blowing themselves up with sickening regularity on buses or in cafes. Our job was to stop Arabs from entering the country unless they were carefully examined. In the news, we often heard of the border being "hermetically sealed." But I saw before me the shocking reality that existed 15 minutes from my home.

> Older volunteers can bring some wisdom and experience

We repeatedly caught the same young men. They could have carried cheap Chinese junk or suicide vests. Only we stood between them and the cities of Israel. The Border Patrol is not noted for having men who have gone to university after their army service. They tend to enter the police force, and force is what they sometimes resort to for problem solving. I was masquerading as a wiser and more thoughtful fellow, and in a few cases, succeeded in calming down young conscripts who lost their tempers with the repeaters who had been caught numerous times trying to cross the border without being checked.

I tried to navigate a careful course in that complex situation – on the one hand, threats or a slap might dissuade the recidivists from smuggling themselves into Israel, while, on the other hand, one doesn't want to see young Israelis acting inhumanely. But I had to keep three things in mind: nice guys finish last in this part of the world and only the tough survive; only a very small number of our soldiers exploit their position of power and act in ugly ways; and one should, in all matters, seek the golden mean. I believe I navigated these challenging waters reasonably successfully.

I don't believe that our left wing, which often seeks peace at any price is on the right track. I don't believe our enemies are true partners at all in seeking peace. Alternatively, the right wing, which believes uncompromisingly that it is all ours and there is no room for any compromise, is, in my opinion, also incorrect in its outlook. But I hope that during my two weeks back in uniform I made my extremely modest contribution to making my country slightly more safe and slightly more decent.

Before returning to my regular work, I treated myself to an afternoon at a large shopping centre where I indulged in a large frozen yogurt as a reward for defending my country. Looking for a place to sit down and eat it, I spied a sight that would excite any truly immature boy, the undergarments store, C Cup and Larger. I sat opposite the store entrance on a bench hoping to savour something beside the yogurt. There were, of course, some healthy babushkas who seemed to come right off the kolchoz and into the store, but there were also some impressively proportioned young ladies who complemented the scenery nicely. There was a sign on the window: Wanted, Saleswomen.

Then one of the employees on a break came and sat down next to me on the bench. It was obvious where she bought her intimate apparel. I told her that I was interested in applying for the job of sales person. She told me, "Only women."

I declared that this was discriminatory and I wouldn't accept it. She explained that it is obvious that many women feel uneasy when a man is present while they choose intimate apparel. I explained to her that, for sure, other women choose their apparel to please a man, and a man's opinion would help some to choose correctly.

She suggested I write down my phone number so that the manager could call me. I wrote down a false number and watched as she returned to the store muttering something about "growing up" before she filed the phone number in the waste basket.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

40ish and bored

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I'd rather be lonely than bored.

I'm hearing more and more lately from friends and colleagues how bored they have become with their lives.

These people range in age from 40 and up, and most of them are quite accomplished in their lives. This is what they have been telling me: "I'm doing well [generally in Toronto this means making money] but I'm just so incredibly bored. I need some spice, some zing, man."

Here is an example. A friend moved away from Toronto and built a superb life for his family in Europe. He works hard, pulls down $250,000 a year, has visited more than 35 countries, is a community leader and has all the playthings television insurance advertisements make us believe we need and want – and this is long before 55.

Another comrade, who is one of those freaky creative individuals able to parlay his gift into a respectable living and has the ability to manoeuvre his life with great agility, made resolute eye contact with me and announced, "Avrum, I'm bored out of my mind. I'm dying here."

I asked him how it was possible he felt so uninterested. After all, his face didn't display the vapid, lifeless look of a Camus character, but rather that of an Isaac Bashevis Singer shtetl Jew – squirmy and wanting but joyful.

His explanation was as follows. He said that people like him and me have an abundant energy and a need to be excited about what we're doing. My friend further explained that when we find it, we consign ourselves to the task at hand with inexorable energy – so that sleep becomes an annoyance. Then, the dreaded occurs. We figure it out. We learn how to do it. We learn how to adjust its levers and pulleys so they are well aligned, and then this thing we once loved, now making us a grand old living, assails our soul with boredom and we're trapped like Charlie Brown on the pitcher's mound.

I figured this required some thought. Fortyish? Bored? Not good. After all, there are 80 years to go. What's up?

After some further investigation, I found it seemed some of my friends had lived out their lifelong dreams too early on and others had never climbed their highest mountain. The fellow who had made the trek to Europe, sipped Ethiopian coffee by the Eiffel Tower while reading classic literature and established himself as a family and community man achieved his goals, making his mythological life a real one.

He said it himself when he told me that in his forties he had imbibed more wine than a man should, walked the cobblestone walkways of Europe so much so that his walking shoes are worn and tattered, and has far too much firsthand knowledge of Monets and van Goghs. Like a child movie star, this man hit his stride too earlier on – his dreams had come and they had gone.

And then there are others who have found that the magical and enchanted dreams of their childhood, adolescence and early adult years simply passed them by. Boredom seeped into their lives because rather than becoming the fireman or boxer they had dreamed of, their days were spent with cartage companies and administrators sucking the spirit right out of them.

Fortyish? Bored? You're not alone. It is a growing societal infection, and if you're not inoculated, it can simmer inside of you until your soul is dreary and lacklustre. Dream. And then dream on more. I'd rather be lonely than bored.

(Allow me to end my article with a blessing for the Jews of Israel and everywhere: osheh shalom bimromav hu ya'aseh shalom aleynu v'al kol yisrael, ve'imru amen. In short – God bring us peace.)

Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario: Dedicat...

TRANSFORMING THE LANDSCAPE

What is the purpose of life? While some will struggle to give a definitive answer, ask anyone, young or old, learned or not, who has encountered the teachings of the Lubavitcher Rebbe and you're likely to get a clear and concise response: Humanity's purpose is to transform the world into a holy abode for the revelation of G-d here on earth. In other words, our job is to reveal the beauty that is already present, contained and concealed within the material world and within every individual. It is up to each one of us to work together to attain this potential, and to do our part to realize the long-awaited promise of a Messianic era of global peace, spiritual awareness and material prosperity. Millions of sincere, practical deeds, such as feeding a hungry family, affixing a mezuzah to someone's house, and being kind and open with those around us — none of which will make the evening news — combine to form a web of kindness that ultimately transforms the entire landscape.

In the Rebbe's teachings and visionary leadership, this ideal is the cornerstone of Judaism and Jewish life, the lens through which all its other values are most potently realized. At times, this mission entails profound soul-searching and spiritual striving, working towards living a more meaningful life. And at times it entails building the institutions, programs and infrastructure that facilitate the growth of healthy and vibrant Jewish communities.

Ultimately, Chabad is about helping people discover their inner self, the Neshama. This book is intended to provide an overview of the institutions, programs and activities of Chabad in Ontario that contribute to the fulfillment of this mission. You are invited to witness the revolution in progress on these pages, and more importantly, you are invited to be part of it.

THE REBBE

To the Rebbe, the Jewish people, and indeed all of humanity and all of Creation, are one united, indivisible organism. And just as a person is not healthy if one organ is ill, so, too, humanity is not whole so long as there are individuals who are hungry, whether for a morsel of bread or a sense of purpose. Thus, the Rebbe is not only the Rebbe of Lubavitch, he is The Rebbe — because he cared for the needs of every individual, in any place, under any circumstance.

A young girl hospitalized in Australia receives a letter from the Rebbe that lifts her spirit and saves her life; a depressed artist receives direct encouragement and inspiration from the Rebbe that revitalizes his life and career; a banker is brought into the Rebbe's inner circle and becomes an enlightened philanthropist and activist; thousands of IDF soldiers receive messages of inspiration and holiday gifts from the Rebbe that boost their morale and Jewish pride. The list goes on and on.

Even today, the Rebbe's unequivocal teachings, uncompromising drive and unconditional love have a profound impact on all who experience them not because of his incomparable vision wisdom, or charismatic leadership — all of which are surely true — but because of his incredible dedication. It is the dedication, love and appreciation for every individual that compelled the Rebbe to offer hope, instruction, admonition, advice and guidance to people from all walks of life. And it is the Rebbe's profound caring for every person, perhaps more than anything else, that were the catalyst for the emphasis in his teachings on the coming of Moshiach — because only then will the health of the entire Jewish people and all of humanity be complete.

For over fifty years, Chabad's presence has illuminated Toronto with a uniquely inspired and joyful approach to Jewish life that speaks to the soul. Almost twenty-five years ago, in the farmlands of Vaughan, Chabad played a central role in establishing a new community in Thornhill, bringing the warmth of its Chassidic approach to tens of thousands of fellow Jews. Several more centres sprung up in the ensuing years, and current construction and expansion projects exceed $15 million.

Chabad has garnered a reputation for sensitivity and excellence, understanding the obstacles to living a meaningful life in contemporary society. In response to the challenge, they offer a uniquely practical, yet spiritually attuned approach that counsels and guides as it instructs and inspires. "Let's go to Chabad," has become synonymous with seeking a lively Jewish experience, and indeed its centres and synagogues have become known as the addresses for inspired, living Judaism.

Internationally, part of Chabad's mystique and attractiveness lies in its willingness and ability to travel to isolated communities and create a Jewish environment seemingly out of nothing. From Anchorage to Zimbabwe, wherever you can find Coke, you can find Chabad. The personal sacrifice of a young family moving to an isolated community, and their tireless efforts to create a Jewish presence where no infrastructure exists, command respect and admiration in all circles.

All of these efforts stem from the belief that every individual has the right and the need to get in touch with his or her soul. A family that finds itself far from the Jewish community and a student pursuing studies at a distant university all deserve the same opportunity. And the unconditional love that is an inherent part of the Chabad philosophy prompts it to extend its presence, and its warmth, to every place.

Imagine… A new rabbi and rebbitzin move to town, set up shop, and start encouraging people who have been living a contented life devoid of Jewish observance to start doing all sorts of new things: wrap leather boxes on your arm and head while chanting an ancient prayer; light candles and celebrate with family on Friday evenings instead of watching prime time; shake a bouquet of branches and a fancy lemon inside a wooden hut in the fall; insist that a giant menorah be erected at city hall, and that it be lit by the mayor himself. What's with these people?

You would think that the community would resist. But instead, they and their family are embraced and (for the most part) encouraged to do their work. Why? Judaism teaches that the feelings we radiate are reflected back at us from others, like the reflection of a face in a mirror. Being a Chabad shaliach, an emissary of the Rebbe, is not a job — it's a calling. The rabbi and his family see themselves as a permanent part of the community they move into, not a temporary appendage to it, and view the entire community as an extended family — living, laughing and growing together.

The moment of truth had arrived. The Israelites are at the brink of liberation from centuries of slavery, and all ears turn to Moses. What would be his message? Liberation? Freedom? The Land of Israel? Instead, Moses speaks about children, about the duty to convey the Torah and its teachings to future generations. As a result, Jews have never forgotten that freedom is a never-ending effort of education in which parents, teachers, homes and schools are all partners in the dialogue and transmission from generation to generation.

Chabad's yeshivas and schools aim to continue the legacy of Jewish learning for generations to come using the same principle that drives its other activities: Every Jew has a soul to be nurtured and continuously developed. Currently, over 750 boys and girls from all backgrounds are embraced and encouraged to explore the tradition of their grandparents in friendly and intellectually stimulating programs of study.

The Israelites are about to receive the Torah at Mount Sinai, and G-d asks for a guarantor to ensure the continued bond between the people and the Torah. All of Moses' candidates, even angels and scholars, are categorically rejected. But when he offers the Jewish children as the guarantors, G-d agrees.

Since then, Jewish children have been the guardians of the Jewish faith and the future of the Jewish people. Therefore, it is vital that every child has the opportunity to connect to his or her Jewish roots. Because the early years are the most formative, Chabad is dedicated to providing early childhood education programs that are highly stimulating and provide a creative introduction to Judaism, the Hebrew language and Jewish life. Currently, over 500 children are enrolled in Chabad preschool programs. Because not all family circumstances allow for a child to enroll in a full-time Jewish day school, Chabad provides several part-time Hebrew School programs in various locations that foster a connection to Judaic studies and community life for over 500 students. Because summer provides a unique opportunity for learning in a fun environment, Chabad hosts exciting day camp programs that have been engaging children of all backgrounds for 30 years.

The teenage years provide a child with many challenges and opportunities for personal growth. At this stage in life it is critical to be exposed to diverse programs and activities that are both socially rewarding and personally fulfilling. To that end, Tzivos Hashem, Chabad's youth wing, has teamed up with several Chabad centres to create the Torah 4 Teens courses that offer students ministry-approved high school credit for taking an extracurricular Jewish course at their own school. Tzivos Hashem also runs a variety of educational holiday programs, and is currently launching a Jewish Boy Scouts division affiliated with the Boy Scouts of Canada.

Equally important in the formation of one's identity are the initial years of early adulthood before or just after marriage. Meeting fellow Jews and having an opportunity to openly discuss issues that will impact how one chooses to live one's life down the road are crucial. To this end, several Chabad centres have created highly successful, well-attended programs for university students, singles and young adults in various communities.

GEN-J

Director: Rabbi Levi Jacobson :: 416.222.7105 x240 :: www.genj.net [est. 1999]

Gen-J (Generation Judaism) is the Jewish Russian Community Centre's program for young adults. The point of this program is to provide an environment for Jews age 18 – 31, specifically from the Former Soviet Union, where they can discover their roots, heritage, culture and each other, by creating educational, and social programs and events that are fun and exciting in a warm, accepting and non-judgmental atmosphere.

Programs run by Gen-J include: Birthright Israel trips, monthly Shabbat dinner program, weekend getaways, social events and classes.

Jewish holidays are not merely commemorations of historic events – they relive them. The spiritual energy of each holiday is present at its annual observance, along with the heavenly gifts and the opportunities for personal growth that come with it. Celebrated with the right focus and enthusiasm, each holiday presents a unique window into a different dimension of the Jewish soul. Passover, for example, is the festival of liberation when we can become motivated to liberate ourselves from our personal slaveishness.

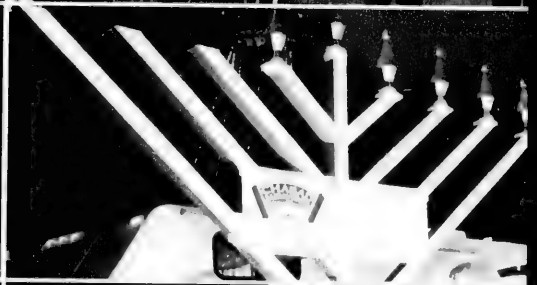
Holiday awareness programs, where Chabad brings the Judaism out into the streets in the form of Sukkamobiles, Public Menorah, Mitzvah Tanks and the like, bring the spark of Jewish life to those who might not otherwise experience it.



Community Service

Chabad's commitment to every Jew is perhaps most evident in its extensive community services programs. The Friendship Circle provides one-on-one programming for children with special needs. Every week, hundreds of volunteers meet with people at their homes and businesses offering a word of inspiration, assistance with Jewish observance and a friendly chat. Volunteers and chaplains also pay regular visits to hospitals to visit the ill and to jails to visit Jewish inmates, helping to lift their spirits and ensure that all their needs, both material and religious, are being met.

The weekly visits, eagerly awaited, help boost moral, and the teenage volunteers learn to share and give, and recognize that they can make a difference. Specially For Women

In many ways, women are the unsung heros of Jewish life. The Rebbe's teachings are replete with messages of inspiration directed at Jewish women, telling them of the central role they must play in the survival of the Jewish people, as in centuries past, and encouraging them to take active, leadership roles in community life. Chabad's mikvahs enable women to perform the important mitzvah of Jewish family purity in pleasant and luxurious settings. Programs and classes for women offer occasions for socializing and learning, and foster a unique exploration of the feminine spirit within Jewish life.

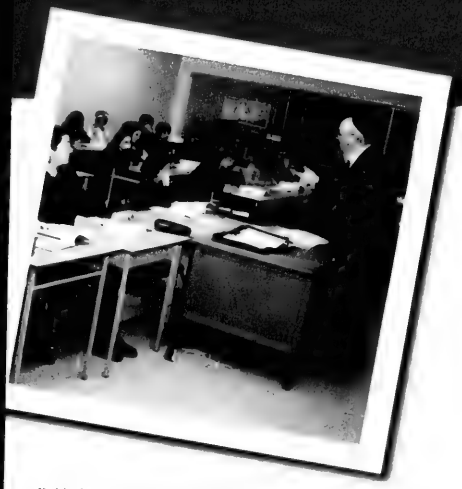
SHABBAT

Adult Education



▲ Rabbi Yossi Gansburg delivers a lecture.

The Torah contains wisdom for living a meaningful life that transcends time and space — it has been the foundation and inspiration of the Jewish people throughout history. The Chabad approach makes even the most esoteric teachings of Judaism accessible, opening up the mind to ideas that are both motivational and grounding. On any given day, at virtually any time, there is a class in progress in which participants and instructors grow and learn together. The opposite page contains a sampling of these ongoing classes.

Chabad's Jewish Learning Institute (JLI, see below) offers three 6-8 week courses per year in various locations in the GTA, as well as Parsha and Talmud courses.

Additionally, every Chabad centre hosts an assortment of special lectures and seminars that bring the best inspirational speakers from around the world to local communities.

In total:

- Over 200 regularly scheduled classes take place each week
- Over 1,700 people attend these weekly classes
- Thousands more attend seasonal courses and special lectures

Chabad @ Flamingo's Robinson Family Institute of Jewish Learning provides thought provoking adult learning that is diverse, participatory and stimulating. Courses and lectures are presented in relevant, exciting subject areas that are practical to the ordinary, are received with feedback from the community, catering to all, regardless of background or affiliation.

Topics change each semester with material that is presented at a comfortable pace, ensuring that there is something satisfying for everyone. These down to earth presentations encourage questions, dialogue and critical thinking are becoming increasingly popular and well attended.

Maimonides writes that in the Messianic era knowledge will permeate the world like the water covers the sea. Part of the mission in anticipation and preparation for that time is to bring about a reality in which every individual, including those who do not access traditional modes of learning, can share in the privilege of the self-discovery and transformative quality of Jewish wisdom. Because it affirms that everything is created with a purpose, Chabad philosophy insists that every medium, if properly utilized, can contribute to this goal. Chabad's media and publication projects provide inspiration and food for thought in television, radio, magazines, telephone and the Internet. Through these initiatives, Chabad takes the idea of Jewish content at your fingertips to a new level and provides exciting, fresh Jewish content that can be accessed 24 hours a day, six days a week.

Blair urges talks with Palestinians

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and visiting British Prime Minister Tony Blair shifted the spotlight from Lebanon to the Palestinians during a meeting in Jerusalem last Saturday night, with Olmert saying at a joint press conference that he's willing to meet Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas without preconditions, including the release of kidnapped Israel Defence Forces corporal Gilad Shalit.

"I remain dedicated to advancing the political process with the Palestinians, according to the 'road map' [peace plan], in accordance with the sequence in all of its phases, starting with the implementation of the first phase, which calls for the dismantling of the terrorist organizations," Olmert said. "There can be no short cuts in implementing this process."

The prime minister said he told Blair he would be willing to work closely with Abbas and that he intends to meet with him.

Olmert, who had recently said that such a meeting would not take place until Shalit is released, now says a meeting could actually help in winning freedom for Shalit, who was kidnapped in June by Hamas members in a cross-border raid and taken to Gaza.

"The first priority with the Palestinians is actually the immediate release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit," Olmert said.

Blair, facing a barrage of criticism at home and within his own party for what is perceived as too strong support for Israel during the

1 in 3 Canadians blame Israel for 9/11

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MOTREAL — Thirty-eight per cent of Quebecers think 9/11 was at least partly the result of Israel's actions in the Middle East, the highest of any region of Canada, according to a poll commissioned by the Montreal-based Association for Canadian Studies (ACS).

Overall, 31 per cent of all Canadians, including Quebecers, hold the same opinion. When Quebec responses are deducted from the national total, about 27 per cent of the rest of Canada think Israel's actions were a "primary cause" of 9/11.

Opinion more common among Quebecers: poll

ACS director Jack Jedwab said the more than 10-point spread on this question between Quebecers and other Canadians is significant. In addition, the great majority of Quebecers, more than three-quarters – well above the Canadian average of 63 per cent – believe the Sept. 11 attacks were also at least in part caused by U.S. foreign policy.

When Quebec is compared to the rest of Canada alone, the spread is about 20 per cent, which Jedwab also sees as a wide gap.

An equal proportion of Quebecers and Canadians as a whole, about two-thirds, said a primary cause of 9/11 was a reaction of Islamic fundamentalism against the West.

Search Continues

NORTH BAY, Ont. — An Ontario Provincial Police search for the body of a Toronto man who is presumed to have drowned in Lake Nipissing continued last week with the help of Jewish volunteers. Eli Horowitz, 30, a father of three, went missing Aug. 21 after going on a swimming and fishing trip in a rented six-metre boat with his father-in-law, Eli Mondrowitz, 56, of Richmond Hill, Ont. The two were vacationing in the North Bay area with their families and failed to return from the trip. The boat later turned up empty, and Mondrowitz was found dead five days later on the shore of an island on the lake. Horowitz is a paramedic who helped found the Toronto chapter of Hatzoloh, a volunteer-based emergency medical service eight years ago. It has offered a $3,000 reward to anyone who finds his body. Scores of volunteers from Hatzoloh and the Toronto Jewish community have been helping in the search.

Rallying For Darfur

TORONTO — Retired UN peacekeeper Senator Romeo Dallaire will be the keynote speaker at a Sept. 17 rally in Toronto's Ramsden Park that's part of a Global Day for Darfur. Co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan and others, the 2 p.m. event is being held to mark the opening of the UN General Assembly. For more information, go to dayfordarfur.org. Rallies will also be held in Calgary, Montreal and Vancouver on the same day.

Annan Chides Iran

TEHRAN — UN Secretary General Kofi Annan urged Iranians to accept the Shoah as fact. "I think the tragedy of the Holocaust is a sad and an undeniable historical fact, so we should really handle that, accept that fact and teach children what happened in World War II and ensure that it is never repeated," Annan said Sept. 3 on a visit to Tehran. Annan stirred up Jewish ire by meeting with Iranian President, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has called the Shoah a myth and urges Israel's destruction. While in Tehran, Annan also dismissed as "distasteful" a state-sponsored exhibit of cartoons denying the Holocaust.

Irving Loses Appeal

VIENNA — Austria's Supreme Court rejected an appeal by British Holocaust denier David Irving. A Vienna court sentenced Irving to three years in prison in February for speeches he gave in 1989 during which he argued the Shoah was exaggerated. He was arrested in November when he returned to Austria to give a lecture. He has been in custody since. Austria has some of Europe's strictest punishments for Holocaust denial. Irving pleaded guilty and said he erred in claiming Auschwitz did not have gas chambers.

Anniversary Marked

HELSINKI — Finland marked the 100th anniversary of the Helsinki synagogue. The Sept. 3 celebration, led by the Jewish community, was attended by President Tarja Halonen and Israel's tourism minister, Isaac Herzog, as well as Muslim, Lutheran, Catholic and Orthodox church leaders. The Finnish capital is home to 1,200 Jews; about 600 more live outside of Helsinki.

Interfaith Agreement

LONDON — Israel's chief rabbis and Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams signed an agreement last week aimed at continuing interfaith dialogue. Sephardi Chief Rabbi Rabbi Shlomo Amar and Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger signed the document Sept. 5. Williams acknowledged there are differences of opinion over how to reduce Mideast tensions.

Child Porn Suspect Worked in Jewish Area

David Miller

TORONTO — A man who was arrested last month on child porn charges once worked at a day-care centre in a heavily Jewish area, and parents with information about him are being urged to contact police.

Police said David Miller, 33, worked at a licensed day-care centre in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue area from 1989 to 1999 and babysat for area families, mostly through contacts he made at the centre. Police wouldn't reveal the centre's name, so as not to alarm parents there, and said there have been no known complaints from day-care clients and no evidence day-care children were depicted in seized material.

Miller was arrested after an Aug. 15 raid on an apartment he shared with another man turned up thousands of pornographic photos and movies containing young children, police said. Most are boys and the youngest is a toddler. Miller has been charged with possessing and making child pornography, while the other man has been charged with possessing, making and distributing child pornography.

Anyone with information can call Toronto Police at 416-808-8500, or Crime Stoppers at 416-222-TIPS (8477).

Two-state solution has receded since war: Dershowitz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The prospect of peace between Israel and the Palestinians has been set back by the recent war in Lebanon, Harvard law professor and Israel advocate Alan Dershowitz said last week.

But the fighting has made it possible for Israel to make peace with Syria, he added.

Dershowitz, here to address the UJA Israel Emergency Campaign and speak to Jewish students at the University of Toronto, struck pessimistic and optimistic notes in discussing the current situation in the Middle East.

The chance of peace with the Palestinians based on further Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank and a two-state solution has receded since Hamas and Hezbollah ambushed Israeli army border posts earlier this summer and Israel responded by attacking them in what turned out to be a two-front war in Lebanon and the Gaza Strip, he said.

"It's hard to ask Israel to give up land today. This war has set back the chances of peace considerably."

As a result, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's plan for a unilateral Israeli pullout from the West Bank would be "a very hard sell now," and the Palestinians have missed an opportunity to gain more territory for a future state, he noted.

But Dershowitz did not altogether rule out the chances of a peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians.

"I think there will be peace eventually. A two-state solution is the only possibility."

Rebutting the accusation that Israel's occupation of the West Bank causes terrorism, Dershowitz said that terrorism is, is fact, the cause of the occupation.

If not for terrorism, he observed, Israel would be willing to withdraw from the West Bank.

Urging Israel to make a peace overture to Damascus, Dershowitz said that Syria, a supporter of Hezbollah, could hold the key to breaking up Arab radicalism in the region.

Saying that Syria might be willing to sign a peace treaty with Israel modelled on Israel's 1979 accord with Egypt, he stated that Israel would be better off dealing with the present Syrian secular regime than with an Islamic one in the future.

But an Israeli leader who opts for peace with Syria would have to be bold and courageous, said Dershowitz, author of The Case for Israel (2003) and The Case for Peace: How the Arab-Israeli Conflict Can be Resolved (2005), which came out in paperback during Israel's war with Hezbollah.

Calls in the Arab world for a one-state solution to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute are an implicit rejection of Israel's right to exist, he said.

But if faced with a "realistic possibility for peace," Israel should be ready to relinquish territory.

Israel has a right to annex Hebron, the only town in the West Bank partially inhabited by Jews. But if he were Israel's prime minister, he would give it up in the interests of peace. Nevertheless, he added, Jews have a right to live in Hebron.

In a reference to the war in Lebanon, Dershowitz said that Israel was not all that prepared for it, and that its uncertain outcome has weakened Israel's deterrent posture.

Dershowitz attacked Louise Arbour, the Canadian head of the United Nation's human rights commission, who recently suggested that Israel had committed war crimes in Lebanon.

Describing her as an ignorant and villainous person who does not know "the first thing" about international law, he said that she is "a terrorist's best friend."

Attacking Tehran's bid to be a nuclear power, Dershowitz said that Iran is the world's most dangerous country today, bar none.

If there was even a one per cent chance that Iran intended to drop an atomic bomb on Tel Aviv, Israel would have no option but to preempt the attack.

Asked if Israeli Arabs are second-class citizens, Dershowitz said that Israel must grant them full equality, both in de facto and de jure terms.

Arab citizens still face de facto discrimination, but legal discrimination is ending, he pointed out.

In reply to another question, Dershowitz said that criticism of Israel is very healthy, should be welcomed and is not anti-Semitic. But he added that demonizing Israel is wrong and unacceptable.

Camp Kadimah

From the editor's desk

There is an especially memorable, throat-catching scene in the movie Field of Dreams and in the book Shoeless Joe, on which the film was based.

Magically transported to an impossibly beautiful, ethereally green and glistening baseball diamond patched out of a luscious, dense field of high, waving stalks of corn, one of the bewildered, long-gone, but suddenly alive again baseball players turns to the protagonist, the creator of the playing field, and asks "Is this heaven?"

"No," comes the quick reply. "It's Iowa."

That is how I felt at the end of July this past summer.

It seemed like heaven. But it wasn't Iowa.

It was the fabled, deeply inspiring premises of Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia, about an hour northeast of Halifax.

Much like the bewildered ballplayer in the novel and the movie, I was in awe of the heavenly harmony of the sheer sylvan splendour of the place and the buzzing energy of this camp for Jewish youth.

The site was alive with an abundant sense of happiness. That was the first and lasting impression the camp left with me.

Invited by one of the camp committee's co-chairs to visit during the summer, to meet with and address the staff, I was very happy to oblige.

"In Atlantic Canada, this is where you start to be Jewish," the camp's engaging director, Joanna Wexler, told The CJN as we walked slowly, discoveringly, around the perimeter of the camp.

By that, Wexler meant that in understanding the historical, cultural, social and educational significance of Camp Kadimah, one can better understand one of the sources of the remarkably close, family-like sense of mutual responsibility and generosity that characterizes the Atlantic Jewish community.

Camp Kadimah is both a fashioner and a reflector of the uniquely giving Jewish spirit of Atlantic Canada.

Indeed, that was the original intention behind the founding of the camp more than six decades ago. It was, according to camp archives, the dream and the ambition of Eli Zebberman, who "decided that a way had to be found to get the young people of the scattered Jewish communities in the Maritimes to meet and get to know each other."

Zebberman realized his dream.

Through his determination and the farsightedness and philanthropy of Canadian Young Judaea and others, Camp Kadimah came into existence in the summer of 1943. It had 47 campers that year.

Three years later, it established itself on a campsite on the shore of Lake William, in Barss Corner of Lunenburg County, where it has been ever since.

The essence of the camp's purpose was poignantly expressed in an excerpt from the report of that year, 1946. "All the major cities and half a dozen small communities of two or three Jewish families were represented in the camp population. Especially for the children of the smaller towns, and to a certain extent for all children, life at camp was an indispensable part of their Jewish religious and secular education. Parents were amazed and gratified that children learned the blessing over bread, and we found children who were ignorant of Purim and had never seen hamantaschen."

Today, very few Jewish children, if any, reside in the small communities of the Atlantic region. That is because very few Jews reside in the small communities of the Atlantic provinces. They left long ago for the larger communities, mostly further east. Indeed, not more than 500 Jewish families reside in Halifax itself.

Approximately 75 per cent of the camp (340 campers and 125 counsellors this past summer) now come from the Greater Toronto Area. The remaining 25 per cent are from the Halifax area.

But the outstretched hand of the Atlantic Jewish Council, the organizational face of the Jews of Atlantic Canada headquartered in Halifax, which owns the camp, has never been withdrawn from those families wishing to send their children to Kadimah.

"No child in Atlantic Canada is refused acceptance to Camp Kadimah because of financial inability," Wexler advised as a point of both information and pride.

The mission statement of Camp Kadimah is a bold yet concise restatement of Eli Zebberman's founding aspiration for the Jewish children of the region: "To build a foundation of Jewish identity and a love of Israel in generations of campers and staff, by providing a safe, caring community in which to foster knowledge, skills and leadership, for the benefit of Atlantic and Canadian Jewish children."

Wexler and her talented, capable staff and counsellors are uniquely successful in distilling the essence of that mission statement and disbursing the distillate, like seeds across fertile fields, into the hearts and minds of their many campers.

Next week, we will try to understand how they do so and, in part, what the camp has meant to the thousands of campers who have basked in its verdant spaces and seen the very best of Jewish examples these past three score and three years. — MBD

Orthodoxy is moving toward more rigorous observance

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The recent articles in the Canadian Jewish News on the Orthodox community's apparent shift to the right ("Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" Aug. 24; "Is Orthodoxy becoming too religiously right-wing?" Aug. 31) need some nuanced comments.

In particular, it's necessary to draw a distinction between a shift to more rigorous observance of Halachah and a shift to the right in philosophy and attitudes.

Today's Orthodox world in Toronto is vastly different than it was 50 years ago, or even 25 years ago. And the change is a direct function of the strength of our educational system.

Education for an Orthodox Jew is focused on two things: knowledge and observance. We want our children to live as we do – and actually, to surpass our knowledge and observance in areas where we may be lax.

The Orthodox world's vast educational system has been wildly successful in these two areas – knowledge and observance. Today, it's the norm for both young Orthodox women and men to study in yeshivas and seminaries after high school. And this is true among both haredim and modern Orthodox. And, increasingly, they study not for just for one year, but for two years or more.

As a result, without impugning the fine Jews of the past, today's Orthodox community is much more observant than it used to be. This is not a shift to the right, it's a shift to the correct. There has been a reclaiming of the Shulchan Aruch by the modern Orthodox as much as by the haredim.

In some areas of observance, whether it be kashrut or eruv and conversion standards, rabbis in the past made certain decisions based on the reality of the community and what Halachah would allow in often extenuating circumstances. But as the world has changed, circumstances have changed – and hence, some of those decisions are simply not appropriate to the modern community. You can't argue that we need to keep up with the times and then react negatively when we actually do just that. The changing times have created a world where we are not in extenuating circumstances anymore, hence the application of Halachah may change.

And sometimes the facts themselves change and require a response. For example, if there are bugs in leafy vegetables, it would be irresponsible to ignore it. That's not a shift to the right, it's a shift to the correct and an effort to follow Halachah responsibly. Inconvenient, irritating, a change – checking for bugs may be all these, but it's following Halachah responsibly.

I realize that much of what I have written requires more nuance and qualification – the education system is not perfect, observance is not universally meticulous and there are different approaches in Halachah to various situations – but the demographic and sociological changes are real. And this trend will continue, because families are getting larger and schools are growing in quantity and quality. (There are more than 30 schools – excluding pre-schools – and more than 70 synagogues in Toronto's Orthodox community.) And I believe the broader Toronto community benefits enormously from this. I believe that an ambience of Jewish sights and smells – kosher food, lulavim, Judaica shops, people walking on Shabbat and holidays in the streets – strengthens the observance of the broader community somewhat.

The above discussion focuses only on observance, which I've argued is moving toward a more meticulous observance of Halachah. But I'd also like to address the much more thorny issue of a shift to the right in attitudes and philosophy. There is no question that the modern Orthodox and haredi communities see things differently on a number of issues. And it's also true that the tenor of these disagreements can be very hurtful.

However, I feel strongly that the true test of an inclusive philosophy is whether it can be inclusive of those who exclude it. The modern Orthodox community prides itself on being inclusive of different attitudes. The haredi community at times takes positions that make the modern Orthodox community feel excluded. However, the true test of the elasticity of the modern Orthodox community is its ability to be respectful of attitudes that are critical of it. The burden here is on the modern Orthodox – not to necessarily agree with a haredi philosophy if through honest and thorough learning they feel this is not an approach to Torah they feel they can be true to, but to nonetheless respect it, and respect and honour its adherents.

One last comment. It's hurtful to see disputes aired publicly in the pages of The CJN. But it's not because we should cover them up. It's because there is so much that's good and beautiful in the Orthodox community that the broader Toronto Jewish community does not have exposure to. And many fine Jews in Toronto will walk away from these articles with a distorted view of the Orthodox community, which is filled with wonderful people and wonderful institutions of kindness and Torah learning. It has beautiful synagogues; sincere, passionate young people; organizations that reach out to all types of Jews, including the poor and those with special needs; organizations that visit the ill in hospitals and blow shofar for all Jews in hospitals; and organizations that reach out to educate and involve Jews in their Judaism. The list could go on and on.

I understand that news by definition is that which is new – and the daily, rich Jewish living that is filled with Torah in all its parts – its ritual, its learning, and its kindness – is not really news, it's "olds." Nonetheless, it hurts me as an Orthodox Jew to feel that only the growing pains of a rapidly expanding community make the headlines, while its richness and passion remain unmentioned.

Our Toronto Orthodox community contributes in many ways to the strength of the wider Jewish community, and Toronto's Jewish community is richer in many ways as a result. And with a fine communal structure of schools and institutions, the Orthodox community will continue to grow both numerically and in quality. Growth brings challenges, but they are good challenges. And with this growth, the Toronto Jewish community will continue to benefit and continue to be a model of full and rich Jewish living in the world Jewish community.

Israeli hospital helped war 'refugees' in distress

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Two weeks after the eruption of the recent war in Lebanon, the Meir Medical Center in Kfar Saba set up a telephone line to assist Israeli "refugees" in distress.

Mannned by a team of psychologists, psychiatrists and social workers, the help line catered to civilians who had reached the safety of central Israel after temporarily leaving their homes in the Galilee to escape the daily barrage of Hezbollah rocket fire.

The help line, the subject of considerable media coverage in Israel, was established at the suggestion of staff members.

When hostilities ended on Aug. 14 with a United Nations ceasefire, it was closed.

"Dozens of people called," said Dr. Ehud Davidson, the chief executive officer of the Meir Medical Center, which serves about 10 per cent of Israel's population in the Sharon region, and is Israel's seventh biggest hospital.

The individuals who called the help line had suffered trauma and were now in need of advice and counselling.

"It was important for them to talk about it," said Davidson, who was in Toronto last week to discuss plans to create the Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Center.

The callers, now out of enemy rocket range, were primarily concerned about the effects that the barrage may have had on their children.

As far as he can ascertain, the pschological impact of the Katyushas was negligible and short-lived.

During the war, the Meir Medical Center, with 2,400 employees and 713 beds, also treated a handful of civilians injured by Katyushas.

Twenty of its 500 doctors, mostly surgeons and orthopedic specialists, fulfilled their reserve duty by tending to wounded soldiers back from the fighting in Lebanon.

The centre has a track record in treating trauma.

"We're about five kilometres from the West Bank and, unfortunately, we're used to terrorist activities," Davidson said.

Dr. Ehud Davidson

During the second Palestinian uprising, which broke out six years ago this month, Palestinian suicide bombers wreaked havoc in the Sharon region, targeting such towns as Netanya and Kfar Saba, and the Meir Medical Center treated the casualties.

Davidson will be back in Toronto in November to officially launch the Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Center, the first chapter of its kind in Canada.

"Whatever assistance we can get for renovations, building projects and the acquisition of modern medical equipment will be greatly appreciated," he said.

"Tuesday, Sept. 11, 2001, dawned temperate and nearly cloudless in the eastern United States. Millions of men and women readied themselves for work." These are the first lines, understated and elegantly written, of The 9/11 Commission Report: Final Report of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

Thirteen chapters and 567 pages later, the commissioners, under the chairmanship and vice-chairmanship of Thomas Kean and Lee Hamilton respectively, carefully and comphrehensively documented "the facts and the circumstances relating to the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001."

Their report, delivered some three years after the attack, was straightforward and non-partisan. "Americans are still thinking and talking about how to protect our nation in this new era. The national debate continues." Two years later, the debate ensues. None of the issues laid bare on that "nearly cloudless" morning five years ago when 2,749 people were killed, has been resolved. But the debate has been joined far beyond the shores of the United States.

How do democracies, how does the West, how do civilized, decent, life-loving individuals wherever they live, fight against violent, radical, suicidal, death-embracing terrorism?

Canada is part of the debate. Indeed, it is part of the fight. Some 2,200 Canadian soldiers are in Afghanistan at this very moment, part of a larger NATO mission trying to root out Al Qaeda terrorists and stabilize the country in which the terrorists found sanctuary and that their Taliban protectors brutalized.

But 9/11 was part of a more complicated anti-Western grotesquerie, and it may have been foretold merely days before the planes slammed into the twin towers and the Pentagon. A week before 9/11, the World Conference Against Racism, an unrestrained, ugly festival of hate and invective against Jews, Israel and the West was held in Durban, South Africa. As Irwin Cotler has written, "Indeed, if 9/11 overshadowed Durban, Durban may be said to have foreshadowed 9/11."

The two events were ideologically linked.

Those who perpetrated 9/11 celebrated Durban. And those who perpetrated Durban found full justification, if not full celebration, for the terror of 9/11. Even within Canadian boundaries we have seen and heard the shrill, often deeply felt, polemics. The explainers and justifiers of 9/11 blame it on America's support for Israel. They attribute the rise of anti-western, radical Islamism in large part to the West's support of the Jewish state. If only the occupation of Palestinian lands would cease… they angrily demand! If only Israel would no longer exist… they dreamily fantasize! In other words, if only Durban's anti-Israel message had been heeded, there would be no terror against the west.

The justifiers of terror are its midwives. We reject their perverse philosophy. It brings only monsters into the world.

Until the civilized world rejects it as well, our skies will never again be cloudless.

25 years ago in The CJN

Despite disagreeing on Palestinian autonomy, the sale of AWAC planes to Saudi Arabia, and the crisis in Lebanon, U.S. President Ronald Reagan and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin described their recent meeting as friendly and productive, saying they agreed on a policy of "strategic co-operation" to deal with Soviet involvement in the Middle East.

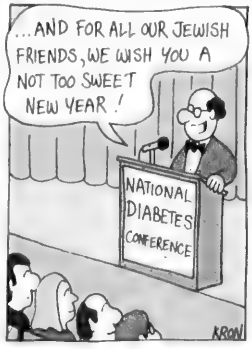
Tolerance needed within Orthodoxy

The article "Toronto Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" (CJN, Aug. 24 and 31) was e-mailed to me and also appeared in the blog world. Much of the article highlights our lack of tolerance. Today, we are faced by so many enemies. We clearly don't need additional enemies amongst ourselves. We need to be careful before publishing views that may be hurtful to others. As Rabbi Ahron Soloveichik (quoting the Beis Halevi) used to say, "Not all that is thought should be said, and not all that is said should be written, and not all that is written should be published, and not all that is published should be read."

In the recent war in Israel, we saw a good deal of achdut (togetherness), people putting aside their differences and working together to help one another. I think that especially in the month of Elul, we must all work together on things that keep us together instead of things that create divisiveness.



In Israel, there is an organization that works to create dialogue between religious and non-religious. Perhaps now would be the appropriate time to have a similar organization to create tolerance and dialogue within Orthodoxy. The article points out the obvious need – creating such an organization seems to be a logical solution.

Rabbinic power

Philip Davidovits cannot point to any authoritative source to support the unfair censorship of the books authored by an outstanding rabbinic figure such as Rabbi Natan Slifkin, so he instead points to an authority of a different kind – rabbinic power ("Toronto's Orthodox community," letters, CJN, Sept. 7).

Davidovits attempts to have us embrace this objectionable ban of legitimate Torah views by suggesting that there is no other rabbinic authority "as learned" as Rabbi Shlomo Miller. The state of Orthodoxy is certainly in peril if rabbinic authority completely takes precedence over reason and open dialogue and debate of the issues at hand. Davidovits, like Rabbi Miller's spokesperson, Jonathan Ostroff, is desperate to show us that the haredi way is the only way, and is in accordance with "God's plan" ("Toronto Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" CJN, Aug. 24). By delegitimizing differing yet traditionally acceptable Torah opinion, however, they depart significantly from the cardinal Jewish principle of pursuing justice and truth, wherever it may be found.

I am convinced that it is simply a matter of time before a more intellectually honest, tolerant and charitable Orthodox approach will once again ascend and hopefully correct this sad state of affairs.

Don't discredit the UN

It's superfluous on our part to discredit the motivations and accomplishments of the United Nations, particularly the recent diplomatic involvements of UN Secretary General Kofi Annan in the Middle East, which were supported by U.S. President George W. Bush's administration ("UNIFIL, UNISHAME," CJN, Sept. 7). If Israel continually discredits the United Nations as an authoritative international organization passing resolutions worthy of adherence, then why should any Muslim country or terrorist organization respect resolutions passed by this globally recognized institution?

In the end, what really matters for the Bush administration and the "road map" peace plan is the implementation of UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. These resolutions stipulate Israel's withdrawal from territories occupied in the 1967 and 1973 wars, and that all parties recognize established states with secure boundaries. These two resolutions are aimed at resolving 60 years of Middle East conflict, providing the permanent two-state solution that both Israel and Palestinians aspire to shortly negotiate.

Politicians fuel the fire

How ironic that Quebecers and some of her most important politicians suddenly give support to the Jewish community after a Molotov cocktail was thrown at the Taldos Yakov Yosef school in Montreal. This despicable act was not born in thin air. This vile act was born out of anti-Israel, anti-Semitic protests during Israel's war with Hezbollah. If the politicians had bothered to read some of the signs people held up high at those protests or bothered to understand how dangerous it was for politicians to walk in a protest where Hezbollah flags were flying freely in the wind, then perhaps this ugly incident would not have happened ("Politicians criticized for joining anti-Israel rally," CJN, Aug. 17). A child can understand that one cannot fuel the fire and then stand back and be shocked when the fire burns and does harm.

Fighting academics' attacks against Israel

The following is the conclusion of a two-part article. Part 1 appeared on Sept. 7.

By MANFRED GERSTENFELD

With a new academic year recently underway, many verbal and other attacks on Israel and Jews can be expected on campuses. The defenders of Israel and the Jewish people therefore have to prepare themselves to counteract these attacks. Given this reality, the approach taken by many – Israel's enemies will run an Israel Apartheid Week, while pro-Israel organizations will hand out Jaffa oranges – is doomed to failure.

To turn the accuser into the accused is among the most effective strategies in any conflict or debate. This simple message has, after years of anti-Israel actions in the academic world, been understood by only a few. In my previous article, I mentioned a classic example of how this works. British Jewish academic Ronnie Fraser contacted the Sunday Telegraph in 2003 about Oxford University professor Andrew Wilkie's discriminating against an Israeli who applied for a research position. When the university was informed of this case, it was investigated, and then Wilkie was severely censured.

But anti-Israel incidents in the academic world have to be dealt with according to their specific circumstances. The 2002 boycott campaigns took Israeli academia by surprise. When the open letter in the Guardian proposing discriminatory measures against Israeli academics appeared and gathered a few hundred signatures, scholars at Hebrew University in Jerusalem reacted by opening a website on which, by June 2003, 15,000 academics had expressed their opposition to the boycott.

Similar actions against boycott attempts were also taken elsewhere, for instance in Australia and the United States. Their concept was simple: mobilize a large number of boycott opponents and thus show the lack of support for the boycott. Broadly similar approaches were taken with respect to the divestment petition. The pro-Israel forces showed that they could mobilize far more academics against divestment than there were in its favour. They also convinced many university presidents to condemn the divestment proposals.

A second approach consisted of calling on well-known personalities to declare their support for Israel. One example was Baroness Susan Greenfield, a British scientist who does research on diseases of the brain and is head of the Royal Institution of Great Britain. When she announced her intention to lead a delegation of top British scientists to Israel, Jordan and Egypt in mid-March 2003, she called it "a positive response to ongoing boycott efforts."

Another supporter of Israel was Claude Cohen-Tannoudji, a French Jewish Nobel Prize-winner who wrote an article in the French daily Le Monde, titled "I'm ashamed," which said, inter alia: "I'm ashamed about those colleagues who dare to express abhorrence about other colleagues because of their nationality."

More effective were the interventions of Alan Dershowitz, a leading American law professor. Criminal lawyers debate boycott proponents much better than most other academics.

There were also several initiatives to hold conferences in Israel in various scientific fields to show support for the country and protest against divestment and other anti-Israel activities. The International Academic Friends of Israel (IAFI) is one grassroots organization in the medical field established for this purpose. It is headed by Andrew Marks, chair of the department of physiology and cellular biology at Columbia University.

Alan Dershowitz

Baroness Susan Greenfield

Claude Cohen-Tannoudji

A third approach was to use personal contacts to solve specific problems. An Israeli scientist asked a Norwegian colleague to intervene at Oslo University, where Dr. Ingrid Harbitz had refused to deliver genetic material to Israeli scientists. Afterward, the case was also taken up by various media, and Harbitz's behaviour was condemned by the editor of the leading journal Science. Harbitz changed her mind and provided the material.

Yet another approach consisted of articles against the attackers by Israeli and pro-Israel academics. In the arguments, a mix of principles and apologetic elements were often brought forward. The protection of academic freedom was a central one. Hillel Shuval, Eva Illuz and Aaron Benavot from Hebrew University, criticized the boycott idea on several grounds, saying that much internal criticism of current Israeli policy comes from within the Israeli academic world.

> Turn the accuser into the accused

They added that the boycott against Israel ignores ongoing terrorist attacks against Israeli citizens and might damage continued academic co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians.

Yet another argument was that a unilateral boycott of Israeli academics unfairly identifies Israel as the only party responsible for the violent shift in Israeli-Palestinian relations. Furthermore, it said that such a one-sided perspective is contrary to academic standards of truth-seeking.

This last argument has a somewhat pathetic tone. Usually anti-Israel ideologists on campus are not truth-seekers. They see their university positions as a platform for extreme left-wing propaganda.

Initially, when a fast reaction was needed, the concept of collecting as many signatures as possible against the boycott was a practical response. In the long run, however, it lacked sophistication. Even worse: initially, neither the Israeli government nor academia understood that the anti-Israel actions were there to stay. They were therefore surprised when, in April 2005, the Association of University Teachers (AUT) in Great Britain adopted an anti-Israel boycott motion. Later the decision was reversed after the supporters of Israel in British academia mobilized. Legal threats against the union by Israeli universities seemed to have been effective as well.

The boycott re-emerged in 2006 at the other British academic teachers union, the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE). A motion promoting the boycott was adopted a few days before the union merged with the AUT, but the merged University and College Union (UCU) did not consider the motion relevant.

In their reasoning, the defenders of Israel don't use the most elementary argument. The subject of academic boycotts should be approached in a rational way by those who pretend to be human rightists. The argument should be that universities to be boycotted should be ranked according to severity of misbehaviour. At the top of such a list would be those institutions where teachers and student unions call for genocide or murder. Next in line would be those where other criminal incitement takes place.

> Pro-Israel advocates should shift their paradigm

Such a ranking approach would identify several Palestinian universities as prime candidates to be boycotted. A well-known proponent of incitement to mass murder is Dr. Ahmed Abu Halabiyah, the rector of advanced studies at the Islamic University of Gaza. In 2004, he said on the official television of the Palestinian Authority, PA TV: "The Jews are the Jews… They do not have any moderates or any advocates of peace. They are all liars. They must be butchered and must be killed… Anyplace that you meet them, kill them."

Halabiyah spoke in the framework of a Friday sermon. This genocidal call was thus part of the governmental, academic and religious spheres of the Palestinian Authority and its so-called civil society.

At another Palestinian university, Nablus Al-Najah University, the student unions promoted suicide attacks against Israeli civilians. At Bir Zeit University, in the student elections, the campaign featured models of exploding Israeli buses. During their debate, the Hamas candidate asked the Fatah candidate: "Hamas activists in this university killed 135 Zionists. How many did Fatah activists from Bir Zeit kill?" Needless to say, the "Zionists" are largely Israeli civilians.

Pro-Israel advocates should thus shift their paradigm. Rather than focusing on defence against the anti-Israel attacks, they can use these opportunities to expose Palestinian society and universities for what they are: environments profoundly permeated by a culture of murder, death, crime and corruption. Their so-called humanitarian supporters should be uncovered as allies in mischief.

The analysis of some additional case studies can illustrate how specific cases have to be looked at in an individual way. When the late Sheikh Zayed of Abu Dhabi offered to fund a chair at Harvard's divinity school, one student, Rachel Fisch, fought this promoter of Holocaust denial and succeeded in thwarting his plan.

In its documentary Columbia Unbecoming, the David Project, a small non-university grassroots group, exposed the anti-Jewish intimidation at Columbia University and tarnished the Ivy League school's reputation. Several American academics told me that when they mentioned the anti-Israel bias at their university to administrators, the administrators reacted: "I hope you are not going to do a Columbia on us." Indeed, all one needs is a camera and a DVD to interview victims of intimidation by teaching staff.

Sometimes people unwillingly help the pro-Israel forces. At the end of June 2006, administrators at Utrecht University in the Netherlands tried to censor the remarks on Islamic anti-Semitism in the farewell lecture given by Prof. Pieter van der Horst. Thereupon, the censored text was published in leading Dutch dailies, and the case was given major publicity. So, at the official end of his academic career, Van der Horst, an academic recognized by his professional colleagues, became a scholar who was known nationwide. The discussion about his statements raged for weeks.

The attacks on the Jews and Israel in the world's universities come in many forms. There is no standard model for best defence. Therefore, the publication of case studies is important. Each case has to be judged on its own merits. This is not so surprising an idea, because in the business world, there is also no single recipe for success. There are many specific ones depending on the circumstances.

Dr. Manfred Gerstenfeld is chair of the Board of Fellows of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. He is preparing a book on academics against Israel.

Their devious narrative

While truth is often regarded as the first casualty of war, there are, nonetheless, certain facts and reasonable assumptions that should logically provide the framework for meaningful debate during any conflict. Sadly, such a premise has very little traction when the focus turns to the Middle East.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

For all who have been glued to their television sets since the war against Hezbollah began, and even more particularly, for those among our pro-Israel activists who have been invited to contribute to the overall discourse, it has been astounding that Arab propagandists and others who promote their cause have been so brazen in their distortion of reality.

How can it be, we might ask ourselves, that any rational interlocutor, with any modicum of education, insight, or sense of justice could possibly dispute that Hezbollah was responsible, directly or indirectly, for provoking hostilities on the Israeli-Lebanese border? How is it possible to ignore that, by international law or any other yardstick, the abduction of soldiers and the unleashing of missiles across a sovereign border would be construed as an act of war?

How can there be any denial that Hezbollah is a terrorist group, or that it has been armed to the teeth by Iran and Syria, or that it created for itself a complex infrastructure in southern Lebanon, or that it used non-combatants as human shields, or that it deliberately targeted civilian populations in northern Israel?

Why is it, that even after a full accounting of the unfortunate deaths in Qana, there is still insistence of inflated casualty numbers and histrionic accusations of a "massacre"? And why has there seldom been an acknowledgement of Israeli losses and Israeli suffering?

Rehashing these questions, even with indignation, is naive. The answers are self-evident. They are the kernels of an ugly campaign of misinformation that has been calculated to sway public sympathy and deflect from the ignominy of terrorist labelling and affiliation. They are the essence of a mindset that seeks to validate a philosophy that is as retrogressive as it is threatening and anarchic.

What is even more problematic, however, is that so many reporters and interviewers have eagerly or unwittingly accepted, or at least not absolutely dismissed, the devious narrative that has so sustained these Israel-bashers and apologists for radical ideology and practices.

For those who have been striving to make the case for Israel, it has been extremely difficult to defend against the twisted messages and overt biases of our adversaries. Unless, and until, a new and enlightened paradigm is somehow found, any possible path toward genuine dialogue, mutual respect, and, most importantly, some acceptance of historical truths, will be no more than a pipe dream – clouded in the smoke of hypocrisy and intellectual bankruptcy.

I got my first taste of how bad things can get in Israel soon after making aliyah. Before my first year was out, I'd seen military action on the Golan Heights and entered, along with everybody else, the dark gloom that settled over the country on the heels of the Yom Kippur War. Something had gone terribly wrong, and everybody knew it. We had paid for the systemic failure with thousands of young lives. In the coming months and years, the relatively large-scale exodus of disillusioned Israelis for greener fields abroad spawned dismally black humour. One of the more popular quips went, "Whoever's last [to leave the airport and Israel] should remember to turn off the lights."

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

The rest is history. A penetrating national soul-searching resulted in the Agranat Commission, as well as a revamping of the military establishment and its policies, the ousting of the Chief of Staff, a grassroots protest movement that evolved into Peace Now, and the eventual assumption of power by a representative (Yitzhak Rabin) of the "new generation" of homegrown politicians, replacing the old guard prime minister, Golda Meir, who, in the popular mind, was associated with the disaster.

Nothing as disastrous as the Yom Kippur War can be read into recent events. But the public disquiet, if somewhat more muted (to date) than back then, is not dissimilar. The same diminished confidence in the elected leadership and military command can be felt in every quarter, from the proverbial average taxi driver to the ivory tower intellectual. It crosses all political and ideological divides and unites widely divergent points of view.

The street is abuzz with talk about the gross failure of many of the fundamental and, in some cases, vital mechanisms of our society to cope satisfactorily with the challenges we faced during four weeks of war.

The truth, starkly outlined, was there for all to see, or at least hear about from eyewitness testimony and personal experiences. Its main components can be summarized rather simply. Two thousand highly-motivated guerrilla combatants with relatively primitive ballistics held mighty Israel hostage for a month and there was little we could do about it. The legendary Israeli army was ill-prepared, ill-equipped, ill-informed, ill-trained, ill-supplied, ill-fed and even poorly commanded in a number of critical areas. The political leadership was arrogant, bombastic, loud-mouthed, out of touch with reality, unjustifiably overly confident, and very unclear about what it wanted, what it could achieve and what it should do. The policies, statements and orders were marked by hesitancy, uncertainty, inconsistency, lack of authority and downright incompetence. The local governments and services in several northern communities failed wholesale to function. The populations in the bomb shelters depended largely on civilian volunteers and foreign assistance to fill the void left by the dysfunctional civilian authorities.

In short, if it smells, looks and tastes a bit like 1974, then it just might be in fact the same sort of deep-seated national crisis. No wonder there are scattered calls for the immediate resignation of Chief of Staff Dan Halutz, for a complete overhaul of military thinking and manpower, and for a serious investigation into bungled operations and conceptions to track down and address their root causes. Alas, everybody seems to be asking the same question with the same degree of trepidation, namely: "If we couldn't deal effectively with 2,000 elusive irregulars armed with big firecrackers, how in the dickens are we going to meet the challenge of Iran, Syria or even terrorism closer to home in Gaza and the West Bank?

We are not talking here about winning and losing. We might, in the final account, have won, in a manner of speaking. I should hope so. But then again we won in 1973, too – brilliantly – but only after an extremely costly initial catastrophe. It was the courage of the individual fighting men, their awareness of the utter necessity of not losing, not the inspiration of leadership, political and military, that brought victory – then as now.

No clever spin doctors at the top will be able to smooth over the lacklustre national performance. We owe the limbless, blind, mangled and shocked young men that I visited recently at Sheba Medical Center some definitive conclusions and measures.

Israel's extended leadership crisis

For Israelis, both religious and secular, the month of Elul and the period before the High Holy Days this year has been a particularly intense time of national introspection and soul-searching. The chaos and mismanagement of the war in Lebanon, the strategic muddle, and the needless casualties in the conflict have left many questions, including how the war could end suddenly without the return of the kidnapped soldiers, or even a sign that they're alive. Tens of thousands of Israelis from all walks of life gathered in Tel Aviv on Aug. 31 to demand the soldiers' freedom and warn the Israeli government that this must have the highest priority.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The issues go beyond the particular form of investigation into the war, and whether any future commission of inquiry will have the power to subpoena witnesses and assign responsibility for the failures in preparation on the battlefield and on the home front. And they go beyond assigning responsibility among inexperienced political leaders and overconfident military officials.

The core of the problem, as most Israelis now realize, is that an extended leadership crisis has brought us to this condition. The responsibility is not limited to the current prime minister and the defence minister – the lack of professional dedicated leadership and the widespread corruption in the political class have been evident for many years. And as a result of this deeper crisis, the response must go beyond simply replacing the current leaders with others carrying similar limitations.

Part of the problem results from the dysfunctional political process that we use to choose our leaders, which encourages mediocrity and manipulation while driving away good people. The system, based on small parties and weak coalitions, was designed for 19th-century Poland and allows wily political manipulators to rise to the top.

The moral bankruptcy among the political leadership – financial, sexual, and otherwise – has added to the collapse. In addition to violating the ethical core of Jewish tradition, there is a huge price to be paid for diverting attention and energy away from the fundamental challenges of survival and toward crude personal gratification. The career politicians whose experience is based on the manipulation of power and money in party central committees and local unions don't have the knowledge or the interest to deal with preparing bomb shelters in the event of war, or preventing Hezbollah from acquiring 14,000 missiles, or reforming the educational system.

At the same time, intelligent and talented Israelis who understand the main challenges and priorities have also avoided politics, using their talents in the army or high-tech business. Not every general or CEO is qualified for high office, although some have acquired a depth of knowledge and experience necessary to meet the challenges of political leadership. However, they are repelled by the existing political process and the corruption.

Overall, however, all Israelis share the blame for this crisis. In a democracy, we get the leaders and the policies that we deserve, and there is no one else to blame. The upside is that democracies are also able to recognize and repair their mistakes. The failures of the Lebanon war are a warning sign, and the demonstrations taking place around the country are ultimately demanding an end to the mediocrity and corruption at the top.

In 4,000 years of Jewish history, there are many other examples of failed leadership, including those in the Book of Judges in the Bible. Some of those leaders were good in war, but failed in peace. Others used their positions of trust to promote themselves and their families. After enduring these ups and downs for many generations, the people of Israel pleaded to God, "Give us a king."

Royal families are currently out of style, but most Israelis recognize the need for better leaders and a system that might produce someone who can measure up to the standards of David Ben-Gurion or Menachem Begin. Perhaps the soul-searching and atonement of the coming weeks, particularly among the younger generation of Israelis, will lead to the emergence of a new group of leaders who will dedicate their time to these important goals.

The Kirshner File

Iran committed to building a nuclear bomb

A United Nations deadline calling on Iran to suspend uranium enrichment or face the threat of sanctions has come and gone, and Tehran remains defiant.

Under a UN Security Council resolution drafted by Britain, France and Germany, supported by the United States, Russia and China and passed on July 31, Iran had until Aug. 31 to voluntarily comply.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

If it had complied, Iran would have been eligible for a package of political and economic incentives. But on Aug. 21, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khameni, declared that Iran would "forcefully" pursue its nuclear program, and on the following day, the Iranian government, playing for time, presented a counter-proposal offering further talks on the matter.

Reiterating his resistance to UN demands, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, then made two provocative gestures. He formally inaugurated a heavy-water reactor – a link in the atomic chain – and said that Iran would not succumb to foreign pressure.

As a result of these developments, the International Atomic Energy Agency delivered a report to the Security Council confirming that Iran has neither suspended enrichment-related activities nor addressed long outstanding verification issues.

In the face of Iran's truculence, U.S. President George W. Bush asserted that Iran poses "a grave threat" to the security of the Middle East, declared that Iran must not be allowed to develop a nuclear device and challenged the Security Council to make good on threats to enforce the July 31 resolution.

Significantly, Bush talked of the need to find "a diplomatic solution" to the crisis, thereby dispelling speculation that the United States will resort to military measures to deal with Iran's nuclear facilities.

So what now?

The major powers will rehash the issue ad infinitum, but Russia and China – which have significant commercial interests in Iran – are opposed to punitive sanctions. Speaking on behalf of President Vladimir Putin recently, Russian Defence Minister Sergei Ivanov said that sanctions will not work. Visiting Tehran last week, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan voiced agreement with this assessment.

But if sanctions are unfeasible, and if a military solution is out of the question, what steps can the UN take to persuade Iran to abandon its militarized nuclear program?

Precious little.

But if Israel's deputy prime minister, Shimon Peres, is correct in his analysis, Iran will eventually suspend its nuclear ambitions.

Rightly or wrongly, he believes that sanctions will deepen Iran's international isolation and aggravate the poverty of many of its inhabitants, thus forcing Tehran to come to its senses.

There may be substance to this argument. Ahmadinejad was elected president on the populist promise of redistributing Iran's vast oil and gas wealth and improving economic conditions for his working-class constituents.

But Ahmadinejad, who claims that Iran's nuclear program is purely peaceful and aimed at generating electricity, may jettison these promises because he considers nuclear energy a project of national prestige. Indeed, he has turned it into his political raison d'etre.

Iran's defiance is a function of its belief that Russia and China will endorse its proposal for more talks and continue to oppose sanctions, and that the United States, mired in Iraq and Afghanistan, will refrain from using brute force to resolve the issue.

Iran is in a confident mood these days due, in part, to its perception that Hezbollah defeated Israel in a "divine victory" in the recent 34-day war in Lebanon. The Iranian regime supplied Hezbollah with short-range and long-range missiles, which wreaked devastation on northern Israel, and provided Hezbollah with funds and training as well.

But long before the outbreak of the second war in Lebanon, Iran showed no signs of a readiness to compromise.

On June 2, Ahmadinejad said that the package of Western incentives was designed to block Iran's "access to advanced technology."

On May 17, he warned that Iran might drop out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty – which Israel has yet to sign – if it is subjected to increased pressure.

On May 10, after Iran successfully enriched uranium at a low level for use in power plants, he said that Iran would not be bound by UN restrictions. On April 26, he said that no Security Council resolution could induce Iran to give up its nuclear program.

On March 12, shortly after Ayatollah Khamenei claimed that nuclear weapons were against Iran's interests and contravened Islamic principles, he rejected a Russian compromise under which Moscow would perform atomic fuel work on its behalf to allay fears that it was seeking nuclear arms.

On Jan. 22, Ali Larijani, the secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said that Iran would resume full scale production of nuclear fuel if it is referred to the UN for sanctions.

On Jan. 13, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki threatened to limit Iran's cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency should it be referred to the UN.

It was an empty threat, since the Iranian parliament had already passed a bill closing nuclear sites to UN inspectors.

Iran, with the assistance of the United States, initiated its nuclear program in the 1950s. Then ruled the pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy, Iran regarded itself as a great regional power and an ancient civilization with hegemonic aspirations.

The anti-Western Islamic government that succeeded the monarchy in 1979 temporarily suspended nuclear activities. But by the mid-1980s, the new Islamic regime had a change of heart.

Iraq had invaded Iran and bombarded Iranian cities with Scud missiles, and Iraq was in the process of rebuilding the Osiraq nuclear reactor, which Israel had destroyed in a 1981 air strike.

Bent on reviving its nuclear program, Iran wooed back many scientists who had emigrated after the Islamic revolution, and enlisted the help of the father of Pakistan's nuclear bomb, A.Q. Khan.

Iran also purchased components from western Europe, and signed an $800 million (US) agreement with Russia to rehabilitate the Bushehr reactor, which had been abandoned.

Today, Iran is believed to have assembled the basic building blocks of a nuclear infrastructure. It is widely scattered and deeply buried, and would be exceedingly difficult to destroy by air strikes alone.

In addition, Iran has devised the means to deliver an atomic bomb, having developed long-range missiles that can theoretically reach Israel.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

The current crisis pitting Iran against the UN erupted four years ago, when an Iranian opposition group disclosed that Iran had built a uranium enrichment factory at Natanz and a heavy-water facility near Arak without the knowledge of the International Atomic and Energy Agency.

Having been exposed, Iran opened its nuclear program to International Atomic and Energy Agency inspections and started a dialogue with Britain, France and Germany.

In exchange, the European Union pledged to support Iran's membership in the World Trade Organization, sign a bilateral trade and co-operation pact with Iran and sell Iran Airbus civilian aircraft.

According to Hans Blix, the former UN chief weapons inspector, Iran is at least five years away from developing a nuclear bomb – an appraisal shared, more or less, by the United States.

But some analysts contend that Iran will require about 15 more years before it can acquire a bomb.

Israel is understandably troubled by Tehran's nuclear program, given Iran's visceral hostility to its existence, Ahmadinejad's oft-repeated threat to wipe Israel off the map and one of his predecessor's inflammatory comment that the Jewish state can be destroyed by a single nuclear strike.

Successive Israeli prime ministers have therefore expressed grave concern about Iran.

Yitzhak Rabin described Iran as Israel's "arch enemy" and Ariel Sharon said that Israel would not tolerate a nuclearized Iran.

Ehud Olmert has branded Ahmadinejad as a "psychopath" whose declarations resemble those of Adolf Hitler.

Israel has appointed the commander of the air force, Gen. Eliezer Shkedy, to oversee a possible conflict with Iran, but a war could be extremely costly and maybe not even beneficial in terms of goals accomplished.

Even if Israel stays its hand and lets Washington handle the Iran file, Israel will surely face Iran's wrath, in the form of missile attacks and surrogate terrorism, should Iran be attacked by the United States.

Havurah movement reaches out to young Jews

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Sarah Brodbar-Nemzer is a self-described "unpeggable" Jew. She said she is Jewishly observant, but has a hard time fitting herself into a particular box. She is Shomer Shabbat – to an extent – and egalitarian.

"I'm unpeggable. I was telling a friend that I wouldn't use the telephone for a local call, but I would use the telephone to call people I couldn't walk to," she said.

Maybe this is why the National Havurah Committee (NHC) is such a good fit for her, and hundreds of other liberal thinking Jews of all levels of observance, denominations, professions and education levels.

The NHC, founded almost 30 years ago, is a network of non-denominational, multigenerational, and egalitarian individuals and communities dedicated to Jewish living and learning, community building, and tikkun olam.

Brodbar-Nemzer, 22, a philosophy and contemporary studies graduate from the University of King's College in Halifax and the coordinator of the Family Place at the Jewish Discovery Museum at the BJCC in Toronto, has been involved with the NHC since she was eight years old, and has served on the board since she was 15.

The NHC's flagship program, the Summer Institute, described by Brodbar-Nemzer as a cross between an educational conference and summer camp, attracts Jews of all ages and denominations by offering a place where they can study, pray, sing, dance and meditate while feeling part of a community.

"The havurah movement started in the 1960s by people who felt alienated by the large mainstream suburban synagogues," Brodbar-Nemzer explained. "They felt like they were going to watch a performance rather than engage in something."

She said havurot, Hebrew for fellowships, began forming and groups would meet in people's homes, with each havurah being different from the next.

"Some would focus more on learning, some would focus more on praying, some were for families, others for adults," she added.

"Years later, people felt they could better service the Jewish community by becoming better organized," Brodbar-Nemzer said.

By 1979, The NHC was established as a way for individuals and communities to get together and share with one another.

"[One of] the two main principles of the havurah movement is that it is participatory, which means everyone, no matter who you are in your life, no matter what you do, you are equal in terms or participation. You have something to teach and you have something to learn," she said, adding that at the summer institute, every teacher is a student and vice versa.

Classes, which range in topics from "Men, Women, and Sex in the Talmud," to "Writing and Listening to Jewish Poetry," are taught and attended by professors, carpenters, students and doctors.

"And these people are sitting next to you in a class. So, a renowned Torah scholar might be sitting next to you, learning interpretive dance," Brodbar-Nemzer said with a laugh.

Another important NHC principle is that the havurot are egalitarian.

"Normally, egalitarian focuses on questions of gender. We also focus on issues of age. It was a community in which I grew up thinking of myself as an equal participant, and an equal leader. When I joined the board, I was in high school and people said to me, 'Oh, are you the youth representative on the board?' I wasn't there as a token young person. I was there because I was smart and had things to say."

Repenting for hypocrisy and inauthenticity

BY ELLIOTT MALAMET

Sin gets bad press these days, because it's experienced as a guest that brings a whole slew of unwelcome associates into the house – such as guilt, bad feeling and punitiveness. These alleged running mates of sin are anathema to most, and so the very ability to examine our realities is muted by the desperate postmodern drive to feel good at all costs. And the costs are indeed high, as the soft-pedalling of our spiritual mistakes morphs into a full-blown denial of the need to change.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel once noted that in a democratic society, not all are guilty, but all are responsible. But accountability is not in vogue right now. The great western irony is that the individuals or groups most willing to rush to take responsibility for their actions are invariably evil. Al Qaeda and Hamas, I notice, rush to the fore candidly (alas, gleefully) when it is a matter of confessing who plants bombs that kill thousands of innocents. It's a tragic moment in our development as a species when the virtue of owning up is being taught to us by the most debased elements on Planet Earth.

Children learn accountability from their parents and from others, such as teachers or clergy. That's why an acknowledgment of wrongdoing or just ignorance from such authority figures, when appropriate, can model for kids how to mature into responsible adults. As I have noted previously, the phrase "I don't know" is a teacher's best friend. When the words "I don't know" are suppressed by teachers, out of pride or ego or embarrassment or lack of discipline, or out of a misguided belief that we can answer all questions, and instead a forced and often not credible response is substituted, children learn that you don't have to be accountable for what you don't know or understand. You can cover it up, falsely, with explanations that lack authenticity.

The sin of inauthenticity is implied in the Viddui (confessional) prayer that we utter on Yom Kippur. By saying "dibarnu dofi," that we have spoken with "two mouths," we concede that hypocrisy is our stock in trade as human beings. Rabbi Avraham Danzig, known as the Chayei Adam, comments that this sin is when we say one thing aloud and another in our hearts. Discretion sometimes dictates that we do not express all that we feel or know, but often the duplicity is simply to save face or curry favour with others in situations when truth-telling or honesty are desperately required.

None of us are free from the hypocrisy that damages our souls and our relationships. "Dibarnu dofi" is not the province of any particular denomination or Jewish group. My assumption is that God does not check our badge of congregational affiliation before deciding what's in our hearts on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. May we merit the courage to confront our existence in ways that feel uplifting and not spirit-breaking, and may we have peace in the Land where our ultimate destiny lies.

Your Rosh Hashanah seder

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Are you ready for the seder?

No, not that seder. Although it is far less famous than the one in the spring, Rosh Hashanah does have its own traditional seder. And like the one on Passover, the New Year's seder is centred around food and is rich in symbolism. Today, a look at the Rosh Hashanah seder.

The seder revolves around several foods whose connection to Rosh Hashanah may not be immediately apparent: carrots, leeks, black-eyed peas, dates, beets, gourds and even a sheep's head. The connection? These foods have names in Hebrew (or Yiddish) that are reminiscent of – or even puns of – good omens for the Jewish people. For example, before we eat carrots at the Rosh Hashanah table, we traditionally ask "that our merits increase" because "carrot in Yiddish is 'mehren,' which can also mean 'to increase.'" [http://tinyurl.com/nt4sn]

The Hebrew word for gourd, karu, sounds like the Hebrew words for both "tearing" and "reading." As that vegetable is eaten, we recite this prayer: "May it be the will of our Heavenly Father that any bad decree be torn up and that our merits be read before You." [http://tinyurl.com/lmlnk]

And what about that sheep's head? Bessie Krapfman explains why we eat a sheep's head (or alternatively a fish head). "The purpose of having a 'head' on your table is not to turn your stomach, but that we should use it as a simmon [or sign]; we pray to God that we be the head and not the tail." [http://tinyurl.com/pjmer]

Rabbi Yehudah Prero suggests these foods can actually trigger a deeper psychological reaction appropriate to this time of year. By eating these foods "a person realizes that now is the time he needs to be asking for these good things, because now is the time he is being judged. As soon as the person realizes that now is the time that he is being judged, he will realize that omens alone will not be enough for his salvation, and that repentance is needed." [www.kashrut.com/articles/simanim/]

Although some sites emphasize that the Rosh Hashanah seder is quite fluid, others present a formalized ritual in English [http://tinyurl.com/ovnch] and in Hebrew. [http://tinyurl.com/ru9x9] In order to set the proper tone, the Jewish Agency site suggests that certain verses be recited many times before the Kiddush, such as: "Or zaru'a latzadik, uleyishrei-lev simchah – Light [of Creation] shall shine for the righteous [in the world to come] and happiness for the upright." (17 times) [http://tinyurl.com/msk8t]

The most elaborate seder that I found was created by Noam Zion of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem. In addition to explaining the foods, he also recommends readings and discussions that can take place around the New Year's table:

• Today is the birthday of the world. What aspect of the Creation most impresses you?

• Name one mitzvah you are proud of having participated in over the past year.

• Today is the beginning of new possibilities. What impossible dream would you pursue if you had enough money to take off for a year from your present occupation? [http://tinyurl.com/s8m4d]

Gilda Angel has taken these symbolic foods and performed some gastronomical magic. She crafted a menu from them. Her Turkish-inspired Rosh Hashanah meal includes Keftes de Prasa (leek croquettes), Lubiya (black-eyed peas), Pollo con Susam (sesame-seed chicken), Borekas de Calabaza (pumpkin turnovers) and Tishpishti (honey-nut cake). [http://tinyurl.com/qlasm] Apparently Ms Angel didn't deign to include all the traditional foods in her meal – so I've saved you the trouble and tracked down a classic recipe for Sheep's Head Soup. [http://tinyurl.com/pv9ax]

Although Jewish practices are steeped in ancient tradition, a Rosh Hashanah seder site I visited recommended a contemporary makeover. Here's one modern addition for your table: "Take some lettuce, half a raisin and some celery, and pray, 'Let us have a raise in salary.'" [http://tinyurl.com/lmlnk]

God's discriminating look

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

In the parshah Ki Tavo, we read about the mitzvah to bring our tithes of produce from the land, what is called in Hebrew ma'asser. Once the obligations of giving to the Levite, the orphan, the widow and the poor have been fulfilled, an interesting declaration, which expresses a hope of blessing, is pronounced by the person offering his tithes.

The person goes to the courtyard of the Temple in Jerusalem and makes the declaration.

"Then you shall say before Hashem your God, 'I have put away the hallowed things out of my house, and also have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow, according to all Your commandment which You commanded me; I have not transgressed any of Your commandments, neither have I forgotten them.

"'I have not eaten thereof in my mourning, neither have I put away thereof, being unclean, nor given thereof for the dead; I have hearkened to the voice of Hashem my God, I have done according to all that You commanded me.'" (Deut. 26:13-14)

Then, the following declaration is pronounced in the form of a petition to Hashem: "Look testingly [hashkifah in Hebrew] down from Your Holy Abode, from Heaven and bless Your people Israel, and the ground which You gave us. You did swear unto our fathers, a land flowing with milk and honey."

Immediately, two interesting points beg clarification. The usage of the word hashkifah connotes more than just "look forth." It hints at an outlook, a specific perspective or point of view. The word also alludes to a branch of Torah philosophy that our Sages called Hashkafah, a Judaic religious ideology, or more precisely moral philosophy, based on conduct sanctioned by Torah Law.

Another interesting point is the obvious statement "from Your Holy Abode, from Heaven." Excluding any profound analysis into mysticism, where else would Hashem be looking from? Is it not obvious?

Our entire raison d'être begins with the history of our ancestors Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and runs until the Exodus from Egypt. Then, at the receiving of the Torah at Sinai, we begin our destiny as a nation, as Am Israel.

In effect, the declaration is a testimony to Hashem's kingship. The one who offers the tithes is petitioning and demonstrating his trust and hope that Hashem will send blessings from Heaven to His people. That's where blessings come from. However, they only come as a result of sincere efforts to elevate our lives to Torah Hashkafah standard, which translates to moral standards of honesty, kindness and justice.

Hashem scrutinizes our offerings (prayer petitions) and examines their intent. Actions that harmonize with Torah Hashkafah raise the petitions to Heaven. Hashem examines the actions of each of us as individuals, as a community and finally as a nation and sends His blessings accordingly.

How do we know if our petition has been accepted? The month of Elul is a time to prepare for the Days of Awe (the Yamim Nora'im) through a soul-searching quest. The Talmud teaches that Hashem promises us blessings on Rosh Hashanah even though this day is the day of worldly judgment. As the Talmud teaches, "All pass before him to be judged."

The essential point to remember is that Hashem observes us with a discriminating eye. The word "discriminating" refers to the ability to identify subtle differences and appreciate character-building actions.

With this in mind, we can rejoice in our hearts and look forward to a year of blessings for Am Israel and our holy land Eretz Israel. May this land always flow with milk and honey.

The Great Transformation: The Beginning of Our Religious Traditions* by Karen Armstrong, Random House.

Axial sages preached compassion

Books
Bernard Baskin

Karen Armstrong is something of a phenomenon. Where others have failed, she has succeeded in writing popular, but serious, books about religion. These include A History of God, The Battle For God, Holy War, Islam and Buddha.

With a readily accessible writing style, a knack for simplifying complex ideas and an astonishing range of knowledge, she is a reliable and informative guide in the realm of religious experience.

At the heart of The Great Transformation is the idea that between the years 800 and 200 BCE – what has been called an "Axial Age" – the people of four distinct regions of the world, Israel/Judea, Greece, India and China, created the ethical and philosophical concepts that have edified and nourished humanity to the present day.

Moreover, she contends that later generations, inspired by these earlier religious insights, were able to create rabbinic Judaism, Christianity and Islam.

Just consider, in a period of about 600 years the following occurred: Confucius and Lao-tse were living in China and all the schools of Chinese philosophy came into being; India produced the Upanishads and Buddha; in Iran, Zarathustra taught a challenging view of the world as a struggle between good and evil; in Palestine, the prophets made their appearance, from Elijah to Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel; Greece witnessed the appearance of Homer, and of the philosophers Parmenides, Heraclitus and Plato.

Remarkably, Armstrong discovers that during this period, there was a consensus of thought that stressed compassion over hatred. She writes that despite their different locations, each religion developed its own formulation of the "golden rule," as well as the desire to outlaw war and the need to confront suffering and death as part of the human condition.

The Axial sages preached a spirituality of empathy and compassion; they insisted that people must abandon their egotism and greed, their violence and unkindness. Not only was it wrong to kill another human being; you must not even speak a hostile word or make an irritable gesture. Further, they realized that you could not confine your benevolence to your own people: your concern must somehow extend to the entire world.

In her discussion of rabbinic Judaism, Armstrong relates an astonishing talmudic incident. Once when the sages were involved in a theological argument, God intervened on the side of Rabbi Eliezer. The others protested that God had no place in their discussion. Rabbi Joshua quoted from the book of Deuteronomy, "It is not in heaven."

Armstrong writes that "the teaching of God was no longer confined to the divine sphere. It had been promulgated on Mount Sinai and was therefore the inalienable possession of every Jew. Therefore, there was no need to pay attention to a 'voice from heaven.'"

In her introduction and closing chapters, Armstrong challenges us to learn from the past. "Today we are making another quantum leap forward. Our technology has created a global society, which is interconnected electronically, militarily, economically and politically." She stresses that we now have to develop a global consciousness, because whether we like it or not, we live in one world. Even though our problem is different from that of the Axial sages, they can still help us.

"Auschwitz, Bosnia, and the destruction of the World Trade Center revealed the darkness of the human heart. Today we are living in a tragic world where, as the Greeks knew, there can be no simple answers; the genre of tragedy demands that we learn to see things from other people's point of view. If religion is to bring light to our broken world, we need, as Mencius suggested, to go in search of the lost heart, the spirit of compassion that lies at the core of all our traditions."

A brief review can only touch on the scope and erudition of this magisterial work. It will be the rare reader who will not be able to learn from its richness.

Cousins reunite after 65 year separation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For 65 years, first cousins Eva (Moskovitz) Klein of London, Ont., and Vera (Moskovitz) Hershkovitz of Haifa, Israel, believed the other had perished in the Holocaust.

Their emotional reunion in Israel in 2005 can be credited to Klein's daughter, Rita Hoffman, who lives in Thornhill, Ont.

Hoffman was researching her family's history in preparation for a trip to Israel to visit her son, Shaun, who was studying at Hebrew University. She says that, to her surprise, she found testimonies on her immediate family, completed in 1957, by Hershkovitz's husband, Rudolph. The Yad Vashem record stated that Hoffman's mother had perished in the Holocaust.

Rudolph's address was on the testimonies, and Hoffman immediately contacted him for more information about the family, and to inform him that her mother was alive and living in Canada.

"My mother was absolutely stunned at the prospect of finding family members alive. She believed that her entire family had perished during the war. She then decided to join my family on our visit to Israel," Hoffman says.

Vera (Moskovitz) Hershkovitz in 1942

Klein was born and raised in a small town, Ajak, in Hungary, and her cousin, Hershkovitz, lived in Nyirbaror, an hour away. Klein says that as children they would often get together.

Klein was 12 years old and Hershkovitz was 14 when, in 1942, the Jews of Hungary were rounded up and deported. Klein was sent to Auschwitz, then Dachau and then liberated from Bergen-Belsen. At the end of the war, she discovered that her father, sister and brother had perished in the camps. Her mother died one week after liberation.

Eva (Moskovitz) Klein in 1946

Klein was brought to Canada in 1947 by Congress as an orphan. "I am very grateful to them," she says. In Toronto, she married David and they had four children.

"I was longing for family and discovering my lost Moskovitz family was wonderful," she says.

Hershkovitz and her family went to Israel from Hungary in 1957, along with her sister, Nusi, and Nusi's family. Nusi died several years ago.

During their reunion in Israel, Klein and Hershkovitz spent several emotional days catching up on family history, and Klein met several generations of family members living in Israel.

Klein said one of the highlights of the visit to Israel was a family Chanukah party.

"What a cherished time it was for all us," says Hoffman. "I am so pleased that my son, Shaun, has had an opportunity to attend Vera's granddaughter's wedding in Israel."

While Klein and the Hoffmans were in Israel, they updated their family history in the Yad Vashem data bank and corrected the information about Klein's death.

"I am thrilled that we now keep in touch regularly," Klein says.

Hoffman adds, "There is such a warm feeling, and we feel as though we've known our Israeli family all our lives. We also met Nusi's son and his wife, and they kept in touch with Shaun while he was studying in Israel.

"For my mother, it has given her a past that she thought was gone."

The tough and the toothless

A journalist's task in searching for the truth almost always requires asking tough questions – if not repeatedly, then at least once or twice during an interview. That's the way veteran journalist Mike Wallace handled an interview with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (60 Minutes, Aug. 13), writes former CBC News correspondent Bernard Goldberg in "Mr. Ahmadinejad's Neighbourhood" (Wall Street Journal, Aug. 15).

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Goldberg notes that Wallace repeatedly attempted to get Ahmadeinejad to explain why he said that Israel must be wiped off the map. Goldberg writes that while the media-savvy Ahmadinejad evaded the questions, "[t]o his credit, Mike [Wallace] never let up... in the end all a reporter can do is ask the tough question and let the subject answer. If he doesn't, you can try again."

Then there is Nahlah Ayed who, in her reports from Lebanon for CBC Television, rarely asks tough questions.

During her July 28 interview with pro-Syrian Lebanese president Emile Lahoud, she failed to challenge him even once. More recently, on The National, Sept. 4, Ayed interviewed the family of Samir Qantar, a Lebanese man who, as a member of a PLO terrorist group, brutally murdered two members of an Israeli family nearly 30 years ago and has been jailed by Israel ever since. Hezbollah has demanded Qantar's release as part of a prisoner exchange for the two Israeli soldiers it kidnapped on July 12.

Ayed begins her report by introducing Qantar's mother and brother in their home: "Suham Qantar has been waiting to see her elder son for 27 years. She won't speak about it publicly. It's just too disturbing. So she lets her younger son, Bassam Qantar do the talking." During the interview, the family is looking at photos of Qantar, creating a sympathetic atmosphere.

Ayed explains, over a shot of archival footage, that in 1979 "Qantar and a group of militants snuck in to the Israeli coastal town of Nahariya" and held a father and his four-year-old daughter hostage.

Then she says: "After a firefight with Israeli security forces, Qantar shot the father and clubbed the four-year-old to death with the butt of a rifle. Qantar became a hero to many Lebanese. As they saw it, he was fighting for his country against a hated enemy."

The sudden jump from clubbing a child to becoming a hero is jarring, even shocking.

Instead of providing balance by including comment from the remaining Israeli victim of Qantar's attack, Ayed's story only includes comments from an Israeli foreign affairs spokesperson, not about the terrorist attack, but rather only about why Israel in the past refused to release Qantar as part of a prisoner swap – because Hezbollah had reneged on its promise to provide information about Israeli Air Force pilot Ron Arad whose plane went down in Lebanon in the 1980s.

Running a clip of Nasrallah vowing to free prisoners, Ayed remarks: "Nasrallah called the capture of the Israelis 'Operation True Promise,' suggesting the Israelis were taken in part to force the release of Samir Qantar. But Israel says releasing Qantar is not on the table, despite Nasrallah's calculations."

Ayed does include a brief statement of the Israeli spokesperson saying, "Israel's position on the abducted soldiers is exactly what the UN Security Council resolution says. They must be released unconditionally at once."

But she concludes: "Samir Qantar's fate is still out of his family's hands and depends on the prospect of negotiations. All they can do is wait for the outcome."

Ayed's words make Qantar's release appear to be a political mission, while the pictures of his family treat it as a humanitarian campaign. In fact, the kidnapping of the Israeli soldiers was arguably a crime designed, among other things, to allow a brutal murderer to walk away from prison.

What is missing from Ayed's report is even a hint of a tough question – what does his family think about Qantar's cold-blooded murder of a father and-his four-year-old daughter?

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

On turning 150 years old

(Adapted from an article in the Holy Bossom Temple Bulletin.)

By RABBI JOHN MOSCOWITZ

Guest Voice

Think about how remarkable it is that Holy Blossom Temple is now within days of turning 150 years old. In this country alone, there are very few institutions – religious, civic or otherwise – that are 150 years old. When in 1856 a number of Jews came together to build a fledgling community, Canada itself was still more than a decade away from becoming a nation. These original members coalesced, seeking what Jews always do in a new land: comfort and fellowship in community, a place for worshipping God and acculturating their young to old ways in a new land – and not very far away, a small plot of land to lay their dead to rest.

Who knew that the cornerstone laid down then would turn into one of the great synagogues of the world? Who knew that, 150 years later, what men such as Joseph Lyons, Isaac Davis & A.G. Asher founded would develop into an institution that's been so important to so many for so long?

Why has Holy Blossom Temple endured, and indeed often succeeded?

It's primarily because the congregation – led by professional and lay leaders, but supported by generations of diligent and serious Jews – remained true to the requirements of Judaism and responsive to the needs of Jews. A venerable tradition was respected, as was the power of modernity – each generation refashioning things as they sought the delicate balance between the competing claims of the past and the future. I suspect that something else is true as well: for all the successes enjoyed by individual members and the congregation, a sense of modesty and self-restraint, a kind of elegant dignity, became the cultural norm of the congregation – as I think it does in any great religious community.

And what about the previous generations' utter lack of fear about the future? In the mid-1930s, that courage saw a number of congregational leaders of the Bond Street synagogue take upon their shoulders the responsibility to move uptown – and more than that, to build a vibrant future for the next generations, a congregational culture that would engage and inspire, teach and challenge. They wanted Jews to feel comfortable in their world – and in the world.

What the 1938 generation accomplished is exactly our purpose now at the beginning of the 21st century: to ensure that our grandchildren, their children and grandchildren and beyond have a vibrant synagogue community in which to learn and come together as Jews. The difference is that we will do this exactly where we are now, at 1950 Bathurst St. – only better.

And so there is much to celebrate: 150 years, a synagogue that is as strong as ever, a future bright with promise, even as – or especially as – challenges now draw out our best. So let's come together and celebrate, first on Sept.16 and 17, then on various occasions throughout this coming year.

Rabbi John Moscowitz is spiritual leader of the Holy Blossom Temple.

Trauma counseling underway for Kiryat Shmona residents

Psychologist is trying to avoid post-traumatic stress disorder

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Sitting just a mile and a half east of the Lebanese border, Israel's northern community of Kiryat Shmona is slowly emerging from more than a month of daily Hezbollah rocket attacks. Roughly 25% of the 4,000 rockets that rained down on northern Israel struck the city.

Kiryat Shmona has long been on the front line of confrontations with Lebanon, and after being hit by countless rockets since the 1960s, a local psychologist believes residents today are still paying the price for a lack of treatment back then.

"We can now see the negative psychological affects of this latest war on residents of a town that suffered barrages of rockets 30 and 40 years ago, because these people - the parents today who were the children then - did not receive proper counseling," says psychologist Masha Album. "Many residents are having a tough time dealing with the war and its aftermath, which also makes it harder for them to protect their children."

Album says that, unlike 30 years ago, today's residents of Kiryat Shmona are being treated in a proper and timely manner, helping to prevent the development of post traumatic stress disorder.

Funds raised through UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign are supporting this much-needed psychological support.

Residents of Kiryat Shmona are currently being treated to help them avoid post traumatic stress disorder.

According to Album, one of the biggest psychological problems among parents is severe guilt: a feeling that they weren't functioning properly as parents during the war due to their own stress levels.

"Parents found it increasingly difficult to set and keep basic boundaries with their kids: things like what time they'd eat or when they should get up – things that are the basis of parental functioning – were easy to neglect due to the circumstances," says Album. "Many were feeling a loss of control over their kids which, of course, leads to even more stress and anxiety."

"People here have been through an extreme and unhealthy situation. We've been treating people with a variety of psychological problems since this war began, and we must continue to treat them to help them move on," says Album.

Special education teachers take lessons home from Israel

When Andi Shapiro travelled to Israel this past summer on a UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) mission to connect with fellow special education teachers, she felt validated in the work she does at home and inspired to carry on.

"My colleagues from Israel gave me a lot of strength," related the Associated Hebrew Schools teacher. "It was an extra sense that I'm doing the right thing with the kids and it inspired me to continue with what I'm doing."

Shapiro was part of a group of 25 educators from the Jewish day school system in Toronto who recently ventured to Israel.

The 10-day trip was the culmination of a year-long, additional qualification course for special education teachers, under the auspices of the BJE and its Tikun Chaim program.

"The initiative in Israel focused on a triangle between Jewish education, Jewish identity and connections with Israel," said Dafna Ross, the director of the course and senior special education consultant at the BJE. "The purpose was to tighten our connections with Israel and our Jewish identity through our profession."

A contingent of 25 educators from Toronto's Jewish day school system recently took part in a special mission to Israel.

The Toronto educators toured centres and schools that educate and nurture kids with a diverse array of special needs.

The students they met were coping with everything from autism to physical disabilities, from terror attacks to the loss of their parents.

"The schools we went to for autistic children showed the complete dedication of the teachers," said Shapiro. "The kids are treated with dignity and their strengths are brought to the forefront."

"Israel happens to be very advanced in its special education approach," said Ross. "We visited places which have exemplary practices and this enabled us to examine and discuss how we, as Jewish educators, can take this experience and bring it back to our classrooms."

With strong connections established, the educators in both Israel and Canada are intent on continuing contact with the teachers they met. They also hope to incorporate into their classrooms what they gained from their experiences in Israel.

"We hope they are able to engage their students with Israel in a much more relevant and meaningful fashion," said Rabbi Natan Kandler, a trip participant and the Jewish Agency's representative to the BJE.

Unique Thornhill school set to open its doors this fall

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

A brand new school with a unique focus on Hebrew and Israeli studies will be opening its doors in Thornhill this fall.

Kachol-Lavan, (Hebrew for blue and white), a Sunday school for students in grades 1-8, will be taught entirely in Hebrew by experienced teachers who will intertwine Jewish values into all lessons and programs.

Held at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill, Kachol-Lavan is primarily reaching out to the children of Hebrew speaking parents who want their kids to enrich their command of contemporary Hebrew and connect with their Israeli culture.

"The first emphasis is Hebrew and any child, no matter how well he or she speaks, can join the school. The second thing is studying Israel and its history and the third level is literature," said David Zaltzman, co-chair of the school's steering committee and a parent of students enrolled for this inaugural year.

"What we would really like is for our children to have some of the same experiences we had in school when we were children."

The school, a collaborative effort of the Israel Forum, organized by UJA Federation, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and Israel House – an initiative of the Israeli Consulate - recently hosted an open house at Leo Baeck for parents to learn all about what's in store for the year.

"It was a meet and greet with the teachers, where some volunteer members gave presentations on the curriculum and the programming," noted Bryan Keshen, vice president of strategic planning and engagement for UJA Federation. "We did it so parents could actually walk through a model day at the school in an interactive way."

A mother and her son – a prospective student at the new Kachol-Lavan Sunday School in Thornhill – take in the school's recent open-house.

Because this is supplementary to the children's school experiences during the day, Kachol-Lavan is going to have a strong "fun" component, with material presented using arts and crafts, drama and music.

As well, the students and their families will join in celebrating Jewish holidays.

"We want the whole family to be part of this experience," said Zaltzman, who co-initiated the school with colleague Amir Freund. "So when it comes to Chanukah or Purim, we will take every holiday and celebrate it as a community."

The school, which will also offer a bar/bat mitzvah program, will incorporate social engagements with the Israel scout troops in Toronto.

Keshen said the school's enrolment target is 100 students and space is filling up fast.

Northern Israel recovery represents unprecedented challenge for Jewish Agency

Agency chairman toasts Toronto support at community event

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), according to its chairman, Zeev Bielski, is in the midst of an endeavour never before undertaken by the organization – the rebuilding of northern Israel following more than 4,000 terrorist rocket attacks.

"There was never involvement like this by the Jewish Agency," Bielski said in an interview with Jewish Toronto.

Through contributions from Jewish Federations across North America, JAFI will be spending $300 million U.S. on northern Israel recovery, including social service relief for thousands of residents.

Bielski was one of the guest speakers at a community event last week, featuring Alan Dershowitz, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which the JAFI chairman profusely praised for its Israel Emergency Campaign relief effort.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which was the first Federation in the world to initiate an Israel emergency campaign, has already raised a total of $45 million, which includes $15 million for the urgent social service needs of northern Israel residents.

The social services supported by the campaign include trauma counselling for northern Israel residents; temporary housing for the uprooted; vocational training for the unemployed who have lost jobs or their own businesses; re-equipping damaged community facilities, such as libraries, community centres and homes for the elderly; and special care for the vulnerable.

UJA Federation financial support, said Bielski, who came to Toronto from Israel for just 24 hours, allowed JAFI to move 40,000 children from northern Israel to safer sections of the country during the war.

"Toronto is one of the most beautiful Jewish communities on earth," he said.

Before the appearance of Alan Dershowitz at the community event, the renowned law professor treated Toronto's Jewish university students in the afternoon to a dialogue on building the case for Israel, during a forum sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto.

During the session, Dershowitz severely criticized former Canadian Supreme Court Justice Louise Arbour, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. Arbour had censured Israel during the war for attacking civilians.

"Your own Louise Arbour is a villainous, uninformed woman who, at the very start of the war between Israel and Hezbollah, declared Israel guilty of war crimes, which makes her a terrorist's best friend," said Dershowitz. "I think she needs to go back to school and learn the fundamentals of international law before she starts preaching," he said.

UJA Federation missions bolster northern Israel spirits

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has not only been sending millions of dollars in emergency relief funds to Israel, it has also been sending concerned Torontonians on missions to provide personal comfort.

UJA Federation's first solidarity mission arrived during the war.

Both before and after the war with Hezbollah, Toronto mission participants toured northern Israel to witness first hand the anguish of its residents.

While on a mission in early August, 12 participants found themselves doing the unlikeliest of deeds in Israel - picking tomatoes.

"Because residents were moving out of the north, they weren't always bringing enough food with them," recalled Ronit Holtzman, UJA Federation's vice president of planned giving and endowments. "So we went to pick these tomatoes for displaced Israelis."

In addition to assisting with social services like food provision, participants on the August mission also met with many Israelis impacted by the war, including children who were moved out of the cramped quarters of bomb shelters into summer camps in safer sections of the country.

"We visited a youth aliyah village where kids from the north had been taken in order to get them out of the line of fire and provide them with breathing space," said mission co-chair Sheldon Disenhouse. "The kids missed their parents, but they were being kept busy and it was very much a summer camp atmosphere."

Because the north was bombarded with a barrage of rockets, the participants weren't able to travel to the main war-zone, but they did visit a somewhat forgotten theatre of conflict - the towns that border Gaza.

These areas are still the targets of fatal Qassam rocket hits.

"We met with these people who told us what it's like to live with rockets falling all the time," said Disenhouse. "It has become a forgotten story…and I think it's important for people to not forget about it."

On a recent solidarity trip, UJA Federation board chair David Engel met with several mayors of northern Israeli communities to find out their most pressing issues following the onslaught of rocket attacks.

"We met individually with each of the mayors to see what their needs are, what their plans for the future are, and how we can build a strategy in Toronto to help them out," said Engel, who was joined on the mission by UJA Federation president Ted Sokolsky. "And we came here to show them that we're family, we feel for them and we're standing beside them."

"Throughout our visits, we were told by so many…that while their government may not have been there for them in the early days of the war, Diaspora Jewry surely was," said Sokolsky. "We heard story after story of the great and immediate effect our dollars had in the shelters, in the centres, at the summer camps and in the homes of so many northern Israelis."

A common thread that has and will continue to link all these missions is the response the participants receive from Israelis from all walks of life.

"People there are very appreciative of the fact that as the war was raging, people from Toronto continued to travel to Israel to show our very strong commitment for its people," said Disenhouse. "That bond with Israel is what brings us all together."

Educator looks at women and spirituality in new TV show

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rachael Turkienicz is having a great time filming Uncommon Ground, her new television series on women and spirituality.

"I'm meeting incredible people... Everybody's bringing such wonderful insights. It seems everyone wants to talk about this," she enthused last week, having taped five of the 13 themed episodes.

The hour-long program kicks off Sat., Sept. 30 on CTS at 10 p.m. with guest Leonard Nimoy of Star Trek fame. Television's former "Mr. Spock" talked with Turkienicz about his 2000 book Shekhina, a controversial collection of his black-and-white photographs of women, many of them wearing only prayer shawls and tfillin.

Other guests scheduled for upcoming shows include Canada's justice minister Irwin Cotler, who talks about Canadian law and memories of his mother; Turkienicz' sister Anna Morgan, an author and former CJN reporter with whom she discussed spirituality and education; Raheel Raza, a Muslim advocate of interfaith dialogue and author of Their Jihad... Not My Jihad; Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, founder of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning; and the Rev. Eleanor Clitheroe, former CEO of Hydro One and now an Anglican deacon.

Turkienicz' involvement in the new show, which she is co-producing with her brother Mark, a real estate developer, resulted from conversations she had with the executive producer of the CTS show Passages, on which Turkienicz began as a guest scholar and later hosted.

Turkienicz proposed the new show after noticing a dearth of programming on the combined subject of women and spirituality.

The format, with one guest per show, will be "conversation, rather than interview or analysis," said Turkienicz, who said that "half the time" she forgets the camera is on when she is discussing subjects that are "near and dear" to her.

A graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Turkienicz acquired a taste for Talmud as a Grade 7 student at Associated Hebrew Schools.

"It originally created a bit of a dilemma," she said, recalling the decision of whether to tell her friends how much she enjoyed it. "It was one of the few classes where the bell would ring at the end of the class, and I'd be disappointed. That feeling just never left."

In high school, however, her dilemma was more serious. She was allowed to study Talmud only behind a mechitzah (no longer the case at the school). The situation left her angry, and she lost her desire to pursue Jewish studies, entering York University as a fine arts major instead.

Rachael Turkienicz

But one day she realized that it would be pointless to "try not to want to study [Talmud]." After completing bachelor degrees in education and religious studies at York, she went on to Brandeis University for her master's degree and PhD in talmudic and midrashic literature.

At the time, she had "no clue" what she wanted to do careerwise, only an insatiable thirst for learning the material, which has not been entirely slaked.

The director and sole teacher of the Learning Centre, a denominationally unaffiliated institute for Jewish studies which she founded, Turkienicz thrives on teaching adults from a range of Jewish backgrounds who all study text together there.

"Someone who's never seen the words before can bring something so fresh and new to someone who's seen the words a hundred times," she said. "That's a strong way to learn. I very much like not putting people into beginner, intermediate and advanced groups."

The mother of five, who co-founded the Toronto Heschel School, is also a professor at York University's faculty of education and its Centre for Jewish Studies. She is heard twice weekly on CHIN radio's Zelda Show, and writes a monthly CJN column. She has a children's novel coming out this winter, co-authored with her sister; and is a popular lecturer at synagogues and other locales.

The first recipient of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University Person of Distinction award last year, Turkienicz' community involvements include Canadian Jewish Congress, for which she serves as associate chair of the national executive and chair of the Holocaust Remembrance committee.

Explaining how the pieces of her life and career come together, she says she is "really blessed. My kids are very helpful, and we all work together. When I'm preparing lectures, they're doing homework. We share and we 'angst' together. And my husband [Vadim Bychutsky, a professor of engineering] is incredibly supportive."

Institute encouraged her to take the initiative

As a member of the board, Brodbar-Nemzer's responsibility is to reach out to some of the younger members, to help them get the most out of their week, and foster relationships between their families and the rest of the community.

She said she reports to the other board members to define for them what her role should be and how to work pro-actively with the teens and young adults.

Brodbar-Nemzer said she is a woman who takes the initiative, and the institute was a program that encouraged that.

"I didn't have to fight. At most places, as a young person, you have to fight to be taken seriously. Here was a place where people kvelled when I took the initiative. And everyone was ready to follow our thinking and support us."

She said that at 14 years old, she and her friends started organizing Shabbatons themselves, with the support of their parents, as a way to see each other throughout the year.

"We organized all our own davening, all our own projects and learning sessions," she said.

For young, unpeggable Jews like Brodbar-Nemzer, havurah Judaism is about creating their own Jewish experience.

In fact, the single largest group of participants at this year's summer institute held in New Hampshire last month, was people in their 20s.

"There are just 300 really cool Jews. And there is a community feeling… having all these people around and engaging with each other. And young people get involved too," she said adding that a couple years ago, a group of children organized a discussion on Jewish influences in the Harry Potter series.

With more than 150 havurot and minyanim in 34 states and provinces in North America listed on the NHC website, including Har Kodesh in Montreal, and Or Shalom in Vancouver, there are no listings for anything in Toronto.

That is not to say that there are no minyanim or havurot in Toronto, but none affiliated with NHC.

Brodbar-Nemzer said that in Toronto, it seems that efforts are being made to create a community for young Jews, such as the relatively new minyan Kehilat Or Hadash, but most organizations in Toronto eventually "fizzle out and die."

"There are lots of great, vibrant, interesting Jews in Toronto and in some ways we are at the forefront. We've got great education, we've got a lot of great things here, in terms of kosher restaurants. But [we're lacking] in terms of davening options."

It is because of this, Brodbar-Nemzer prefers to spend most Shabbatot out of the city, either in New York, Boston or Washington, D.C., with friends she made at the institute.

She said that perhaps the Jewish community needs to reach out to the next generation more to combat this problem.

Toronto rabbi writes the book on yahrzeit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Aaron Levine may have all the answers when it comes to the Jewish laws and customs of yahrzeit – how to observe the anniversary of a death – but he prefers not to give advice on the matter.

Instead, he has meticulously compiled the relevant information – including laws and customs, anecdotes, appropriate prayers, and the gamut of [Orthodox] rabbinic opinions – into a handsome, two-volume, Hebrew-language set called Kol Bo L'Yahrzeit, self-published earlier this year (Zichron Meir Publications, $42.50).

The British-born former principal of Toronto's Eitz Chaim Day School and former principal of Toronto's Ner Israel Yeshiva High School, who immigrated to Canada with his family at age 12, has devoted himself full time to writing for 4½ years, following a bout of colon cancer from which he recovered. The two most recent volumes are his seventh and eighth books.

The rabbi's writing career – which included a stint as a CJN columnist in the early 1990s – began after the death of his son Ephraim 32 years ago at age 2, in Deal, N.J. where the Levine family was living at the time.

"I wanted to do something in his memory," said Rabbi Levine, 64, in an interview. Another catalyst for his first book was the realization that the answers to his many questions – like whether or not to say Kaddish if one's parents are still alive – were not easy to find in one place.

The book, also in Hebrew, was a volume on mourning, covering everything from illness to burial. Sefer Zichron Meir, like Rabbi Levine's publishing company, was named in memory of his father, who died shortly before it was published. Following rabbinic advice, he did not name the book for his son.

Rabbi Aaron Levine

At the time, Rabbi Levine, who has a PhD in talmudic law from Ner Israel Yeshiva College of Baltimore, anticipated writing a further three volumes, but much of the material he would have used is covered in depth in the new set.

Parts of the first book have been published in English as stand-alone books. The first was a 1987 paperback – How to Perform the Great Mitzvah of Bikkur Cholim: Visiting the Sick.

Rabbi Levine is also the author of To Comfort the Bereaved: A Guide for Mourners and Those Who Visit Them.

For a change of focus, he wrote an anthology about Rosh Hashanah, which he published in 2001. Rabbi Levine hopes it will be the first in a series on all the Jewish holidays.

His most recent endeavour includes references dating back to the 15th century and draws on a bibliography of more than 1,100 works from the rabbi's extensive home library as well as libraries in Israel and the United States.

The words "Kol Bo" in the title mean "everything is in it," and refer to the encyclopedic nature of the work. The text includes footnotes on every page citing responsa and scholarly Hebrew texts. There are approximately 150 pages on the subject of kaddish alone.

Kol Bo L'Yahrzeit took almost three years of intensive work to finish. Rabbi Levine started with a 30-year-old rough draft and found himself intrigued by the research, tracking down references to their original sources and unearthing little-known customs, such as one recommendation, based on Kabbalah, not to go to a cemetery alone. There are very few books written exclusively about yahrzeit, said Rabbi Levine, who is working on a more accessible English adaptation of his Yahrzeit work.

The Hebrew edition was written for scholars, rabbis and university libraries, he said. The reason he wrote the book in Hebrew, aside from it being "the language of Halachah," was to facilitate the writing of letters of approbation (haskamot) from rabbis whom he described as "great poskim" (halachic decisors). The set includes 17 such letters.

In addition to the letters of approbation, the book includes dedications from sponsors whose contributions enable Rabbi Levine to devote his time to his writing.

On a personal note, he said that writing the book has made him "much more aware of the significance of a yahrzeit.

"Unfortunately a lot of the things we do [in observance] are just mechanical. All the great rabbis write that the way to combat that mechanical aspect is to study about it."

Edmonton man jailed 16 months for web hate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada's first-ever criminal prosecution for promoting hatred on the Internet has resulted in a 16-month jail sentence.

Reni Santana-Ries, formerly known as Reinhard Gustav Mueller, was sent to prison by Edmonton Court of Queen's Bench Judge Philip Clarke, who cited an "appalling" level of hatred in his web postings.

Clarke noted that Sentana-Ries showed no remorse and was likely to re-offend. He added three-years of probation following the jail term and ordered Sentana-Ries not to access the Internet during that time.

Sentana-Ries was convicted by a jury in December 2005 for using his U.S.-based website to accuse Jews of a host of malevolent activities. Jews, he claimed, created the deadly AIDS and Ebola viruses, fabricated the Holocaust and were intent on world domination. The website also described Jews as subhumans and demons and blamed Jews for the destruction of the World Trade Center and the Columbia space shuttle disaster. Sentana-Ries added a bizarre science-fiction element to his postings, styling himself the Lion of the Tribe of Judah and calling his website The Federation of Free Planets.

Crown attorney Steven Bilodeau had asked the judge for a sentence that ranged between 12 and 18 months. The maximum jail penalty for promoting hatred is two years. Sentana-Ries' sentence is the longest ever imposed for a hate promotion conviction.

Bilodeau called the case a "benchmark" and said the 16-month term sends a clear message that society won't tolerate the kind of messages published by Sentana-Ries.

"The material he put on [the web] as so hateful and so strong in its toxic nature, it called for the strongest possible response," he added.

Police and the Crown did not hesitate to employ the anti-hate law in the case, Bilodeau said.

Using the Internet – as opposed to distributing the same anti-Jewish material in printed flyers – made the case more serious. "The reach [of the Internet] is enormous," making it incumbent on the Crown to send out a strong message that it will not be tolerated, he said.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, was called to testify as an expert witness for the Crown regarding the impact on the Jewish community of the website, as well as the role of the Internet in promoting hate.

The length of the sentence "has now set the tone and sent a very significant message to hatemongers," Farber said.

Richard Warman, an Ottawa human rights lawyer, said the sentence's deterrent aspect could be significant: "It will give people a very long pause before continuing to distribute hate propaganda."

Warman, who has launched complaints in 16 cases of Internet hate before the Canadian Human Rights Commission, said Sentana-Ries is not known as a member of any racist organization. "Clearly he is on the extreme fringe of an extreme fringe."

But, Warman said, "when he describes the Jewish people as demonic and spilling blood, that kind of threat has to be taken seriously."

Bilodeau rejected suggestions that Sentana-Ries was more of an eccentric than a dangerous hatemonger. "Anyone convicted [of promoting hate] is not going to be a right-thinking member of the community," he said.

He pointed out that Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel also employed science fiction (claiming Antarctica was a base for Nazi UFOs). "They are doing their level best to persuade people to feel the same hatred they do."

Representing himself at the trial and in the recent sentencing hearing, Sentana-Ries repeated his often bizarre theories, saying that as Lion of the Tribe of Judah, he served as guardian and protector of the Jewish people. At trial he claimed to be of ancient Egyptian descent with "authority recognized by all high councils of this galaxy." He also claimed a number of titles, including Grand World Councillor, Starship Commander Dexter and Guardian of the Arab Prophetess Uthrania Seila.

Farber was cross-examined by Sentana-Ries and in nearly three hours was asked numerous bizarre questions about the Bible, about Allied treatment of German soldiers after the war, about the alleged vengefulness of Jews and about supposed Jewish control of the Canadian economy. On several occasions, Sentana-Ries claimed he had secret information that led him to his beliefs about the Jews, Farber stated.

Ironically, it was Sentana-Ries himself who brought attention to his website.

He called Edmonton police to complain that someone had left Molotov cocktails on his lawn as revenge for his politically incorrect website. Police investigated the site and that led to charges, Bilodeau said.

In all, investigators compiled enough anti-Semitic material to fill three binders, he added.

Gertie and Fred Narvey

Winnipeg couple celebrate 70th anniversary

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Fred Narvey still clearly remembers the first time he met his future wife, Gertie.

"I was 17 and she was 16," he said. "We met at a Labour Zionist program. Her smile was so beautiful. I said to myself, 'That smile is what I want with my grapefruit every morning.'"

On Aug. 30, Fred, 93, and Gertie, 92, celebrated their 70th wedding anniversary with a party for friends and the staff and residents of the Sharon Home, the Jewish seniors residence where they live.

During the course of the afternoon, Fred recounted some of the highlights of the couple's courtship and marriage.

He recalled how when they would go out for hamburgers and a soft drink, Gertie would never be hungry.

"But she always ate half of my hamburger," he said.

Obituary

Writer, historian dies at age 98

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Isadore Wolch, a retired dentist and former Winnipeg alderman who became a writer and historian in his old age, died, Aug. 30, after a short illness. He was 98.

Wolch practised dentistry in Winnipeg for 55 years and was the city's first root canal specialist. "For the last 15 years in practice, I only did root canals," he once said.

Twenty years ago, Wolch put down his dental tools for good and took up the pen. Since then, the late-blooming writer wrote numerous articles about his life and people he has known for Winnipeg's Jewish Post & News and a newspaper in Palm Springs, Calif. He also delivered many talks on the same subjects.

Isadore Wolch was a former Winnipeg alderman

In 2000, he published his autobiography, A Wandering Wolch. In 2001, he published Winnipeg's Unknown Celebrities, a 45-page volume that profiles prominent Jewish Winnipeggers John Blumberg, a longtime city councillor; Sol Kanee, a onetime president of Canadian Jewish Congress and chairman of the World Jewish Congress board of governors; the Hollenberg family of doctors; and garment manufacturer Max Freed.

Wolch's own life could have been a chapter in the book. His public service resume, reflecting his eclectic interests, includes stints as president of the Jewish Historical Society, the Contemporary Dancers, B'nai Brith Lodge 650 and the Canadian Academy of Endodontics.

He also enjoyed a respectable political career. As a youngster, he became sympathetic to left-wing causes. His father was a labourer and neighbours were active in the labor political parties of the time. Wolch joined the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), the forerunner of the NDP, when he became an adult.

In the early 1960s, he was approached by longtime NDP MP David Orlikow to run for a seat on the Winnipeg School Board. He lost on his first try by a handful of votes but won a solid majority the next time. He served for six years on the school board and six more years as an alderman on Winnipeg City Council. He received several awards for public service.

Two-and-a-half years ago in Palm Springs, he celebrated his 96th by having his third bar mitzvah. At the time, he explained that "your second bar-mitzvah is traditionally at 83. That is four score and ten years plus 13. Another 13 years adds up to 96."

"I didn't make too many mistakes and nobody heckled me," he said at the time. "It was very enjoyable."

Wolch was predeceased by his wife, Betty, in 1998, after 63 years of marriage. He was also predeceased by his daughter Judith Schaffer. He is survived by daughter Rona Brown.

No progress in search for school firebomber

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The perpetrator of a Molotov-cocktail attack on a chassidic boys' school in Montreal over Labour Day weekend remains at large despite the act having been videotaped by the school's surveillance camera and despite a $5,000 reward offered by an anonymous donor for information leading to his arrest.

The images released by police show, from an angle, a masked black-haired man, seemingly in his 20s and apparently alone, wearing a beige top and beige pants reaching to below the knees. He is seen lighting an accelerant and throwing it through a glass panel of the main entrance of the Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school in the city's Outremont neighbourhood shortly after midnight on Saturday, Sept. 2.

In the last frame, he removes his hood-like mask as he flees.

School and Jewish community officials told a press conference last week that they're confident and grateful police are putting the necessary resources into their investigation.

The community and police, however, differ on the motivation for the crime.

Police have so far not labelled the incident a hate crime, because of the absence of evidence such as graffiti or phone calls, and are treating it as arson. But Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and Toldos leaders are convinced the perpetrator deliberately targeted a Jewish institution. No one was in the school at the time. About a dozen teenaged students had left the building only about 20 minutes beforehand.

Damage was limited to the school's vestibule because sprinklers put out the fire and the fire department responded quickly, school director Binyomin Mayer said. He thanked the school's non-Jewish neighbours for immediately alerting police and coming to see if anyone was on the premises.

The school reopened the next day, but it estimates it will cost $150,000 to repair damage and add new security features.

Asked if he thought there was a connection between the incident and the recent Israel-Hezbollah conflict, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Montreal Jewish Security Advisory Committee, told reporters that it's "a fair question to wonder whether the gathering of 15,000 Quebecers under the flag of Hezbollah – unfortunately further legitimized by the presence of politicians – creates an atmosphere where fanatics draw the conclusion that violence against Jews is somehow acceptable."

He said many in the community have been asking themselves that question. Rabbi Poupko was referring to the Aug. 6 demonstration against the recent war in which three politicians – Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe, Parti Québécois leader Andre Boisclair and federal Liberal MP Denis Coderre – participated prominently.

At the press conference, held three days after the firebombing, community officials asked that political leaders forcefully denounce the Toldos attack. But reaction was slow and scattered, unlike the firebombing of United Talmud Torahs' library in April 2004, when politicians at all levels, including then-prime minister Paul Martin, immediately condemned the act. (Prime Minister Stephen Harper has yet to issue a statement.)

Duceppe was one of the first politicians to condemn the incident and affirm that Quebecers do not tolerate any such "hateful act whoever it is directed at, or for whatever reason." Boisclair soon after denounced the incident as well.

Quebec Premier Jean Charest said: "No one can determine at this point if it was motivated by hate. But nonetheless I think it is important that all Quebec see very clearly on this issue that we are a society of tolerance, that we are a society that encourages free speech and that we should not and cannot tolerate these kinds of acts."

Federal Liberal leadership candidate and Nova Scotia MP Scott Brison visited the school to express his revulsion against what he called an act of "terrorism" against children and education.

NDP leader Jack Layton likewise stated: "How could someone be so callous as to attempt to strike terror into the hearts of young children?"

Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Chassidic Organizations of Outremont, pointed out there is an Armenian church and school two blocks away from Toldos, as well as a French school on a nearby block, which suggests to him that the perpetrator had "his pick of schools" but went for the Jewish one. "You can't put any other spin on it than anti-Semitism."

Werzberger said there hasn't been a serious anti-Semitic incident in Outremont for a long time, nor has there been any recent contentious issue, such as disputes over shul locations, parking problems or an eruv, which were all prominent several years ago.

"Other than someone yelling 'damned Jews,' which is almost a daily occurrence, there has been nothing," he said.

FEDERATION CJA, which co-ordinates community security, is re-evaluating security at Jewish schools and other institutions in the wake of the incident, but it did not raise its threat-assessment level as a result of the incident. It continues to call for "heightened vigilance" and implementation of existing procedures.

Since the UTT firebombing, the federation has had a full-time community security director, Michel Bujold, formerly in charge of security at Concordia University. He was on the Toldos crime scene about three hours later.

After UTT, Combined Jewish Appeal raised $2.3 million specifically for security, and all 40 school and day-care sites were assessed by a U.S security professional. Toldos was found to be at risk and CJA heavily subsidized the installation of a surveillance camera. The school, located in a former industrial area that is now mainly home to condominiums, has been defaced with swastikas in the past. Its girls' school is down the street, as is a Belzer chassidic school.

'The Jewish community should be concerned'

"While the proportion of all Canadians citing the U.S. and Israel as bearing some of the blame for 9/11 is quite high, the results suggest that other Canadians do see the problem as more multidimensional than Quebecers," he said.

Interviewees were asked to rate their level of agreement or disagreement with three separate choices offered by interviewers, so the results from the three questions do not add up to 100 per cent.

Leger Marketing interviewed 1,508 adults by phone between Aug. 22 and 27. The margin of error for the national results is plus or minus 2.5 per cent. Some 400 Quebecers were polled as part of the overall sample of Canadians, and the smaller number makes the margin of error for Quebec alone somewhat higher.

Jebwab said the Jewish community should be concerned that a sizeable minority of Canadians overall are ready to blame Israel for 9/11. "It will be a big challenge to change their minds. A lot of work and dialogue is needed to help people better understand why the Jewish community, legitimately, feels differently."

On a separate question, Quebecers were slightly more inclined than other Canadians to agree that Canada should be more sensitive to the concerns expressed by Mideast terror groups. Just under half of all Canadians were of that opinion, compared to 53 per cent of Quebecers

"I was astonished by the results," said ACS director Jack Jedwab. "I knew there was a lot of naivete out there, but not this much."

Another Leger poll done in late August indicates Quebecers' opinions of Jews has suffered since the conflict between Israel and Hezbollah. However, a solid majority still have a positive view of Jews.

Quebecers also think relations between Jews and Christians and between Jews and Muslims in Canada have deteriorated since the hostilities. There was no change in Quebecers' attitudes to Muslims, who are viewed in a positive light by just over half of those polled.

The second Leger poll, about perceptions of religious groups and relations between them, was conducted among 1,003 Quebec adults between Aug. 23 and 27 and was also commissioned by the ACS.

Sixty-nine per cent of Quebecers have a positive opinion of Jews, down five per cent from a similar survey taken July 11 to 16, when the war was just beginning.

A quarter in the August poll have a negative opinion of Jews and the rest don't know or have no opinion.

Jews are most highly regarded by the young, ages 18 to 24 (81 per cent), and those whose annual household income is between $40,000 and $60,000 (76 per cent).

The groups with the least favourable opinion of Jews are between the ages of 55 and 64 (56 per cent), while those over 65 have a slightly better opinion.

The differences according to income are not so pronounced. Those earning less than $20,000 and those making over $80,000 view Jews favourably at rates of 61 and 66 per cent, respectively.

Education did not have the effect on attitudes that might be expected. People with a high school education were found to be more positive toward Jews (71 per cent) than those who went to university (66 per cent).

Fifty-three of Quebecers have a positive opinion of Muslims, 37 per cent have a negative one, the same as in the July poll.

Attitudes to Christians remain unchanged from July as well, with 81 per cent of Quebecers having a good impression of this religious group and 12 per cent a poor opinion.

As with Jews, Muslims are most likely to be viewed positively by the youngest age cohort, and the difference between ages is dramatic.

Eighty-two per cent of those aged 18 to 24 have a positive opinion of Muslims, while only 41 per cent of those 55 and over do.

Asked about their perceptions of relations between the three religious groups, two-thirds feel relations are good between Jews and Christians in Canada. But that's down 11 per cent from July.

Just over half think relations are good between Muslims and Christians, which is the same as in July.

Only about a third canvassed in the latest poll perceives relations as good between Jews and Muslims in this country, five per cent fewer than in July.

The perception of good relations between Jews and Christians was higher among the young, the better educated, and those with higher incomes.

Those over 55 were more likely to think relations were not good between Jews and Muslims.

Jedwab thinks the five-per-cent drop in Jews' image over the 30-odd days of the war in Lebanon is a significant erosion.

But the 11-per-cent drop in perceptions of good relations between Jews and Christians may be of even more concern, he believes, because the biggest decline was seen among those who had thought the relationship had been "very positive" – in other words, those most committed to inter-religious harmony.

Jebwab said the perception by so many that Jews and Muslims in Canada are not getting along well is also something to watch, even though that may not be the reality. "This opinion is obviously a function of what is happening in the Middle East and elsewhere internationally. It's source of concern because perception has a way of becoming reality."

Leger says the results of the August poll are accurate within 3 or 4 percentage points, 19 times out of 20.

In the July poll, 1,502 Canadians were interviewed, of whom 400 were Quebecers, which means the margin of error for the July Quebec results is higher than for the August poll.

Kashrut dispute resolved in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The long-running dispute between longtime kosher butcher Omnitsky Kosher Foods and Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir has been resolved.

Don Aronovitch, the president of the Vaad, which administers the WK hechsher, said Vaad staff worked over the September long weekend to bring the butcher shop up to the kashrut standards that the Vaad had been demanding, and he said owner Sasha (Sam) Gehkt and his staff were the epitome of co-operation.

"We are pleased that we were able to reach an agreement with Omnitsky," Aronovitch said. "The butcher shop has long played an important role in the community."

The crisis came to a head on July 14 when Vaad officials entered what was then Winnipeg's only kosher butcher shop and removed its certification papers from the wall. That left Winnipeg kosher consumers scrambling to find alternate sources of kosher meat over the summer. It also created a lot of heat for the Vaad among many of the city's north end Jewish residents.

> 'The butcher shop has long played an important role in the community'

But the showdown between the Vaad and Omnitsky, which has been in business in north Winnipeg since 1922, had been building for a long time.

Gekht, a Russian immigrant, bought the business in 2000.

It has always been the store's practice to kasher meat on request, but not as a matter of course. For the past few years, the Vaad had been trying without success to get the butcher shop to kasher all of its fresh meat. The Vaad most recently sent Omnitsky a letter in May to that effect, but received no response.

"It wasn't until we took action that Mr. Gekht responded," Aronovitch said.

At the same time, the Vaad announced that its two longtime shochets were retiring and that there were no plans to replace them. That effectively meant that there would be no more local shchitah in Winnipeg. Gekht said that a Vaad promise to look into re-establishing local shchitah was one of the factors that induced him to sign a new contract with the Vaad.

Omnitsky had enjoyed a monopoly on kosher meat for the past 10 years, since an IGA store in south Winnipeg with a kosher meat section closed. But Omnitsky's loss of its Vaad certification over the summer opened the doors to a new rival in south Winnipeg.

Hali's Kosher Meat Market is an offshoot of Norman's Meats, a Jewish, family-owned non-kosher butcher shop that's been in business since the 1930s.

"We were getting numerous calls from people asking us if we would open a kosher butcher shop," said Harry Odwak, the son of Norman Odwak (the "Norman" in "Norman's Meats") who is operating Hali's with his sister, Lisa. "We realized that there was a void in the community and we decided to step in and help fill it."

Under the terms of its agreement with the Vaad, Hali's is operating inside Norman's Meats for three months on a trial basis. The Odwak Family is committed to relocating Hali to a stand-alone store if sales are strong.

Harry Odwak said business thus far has been good, but he and Lisa are not yet prepared to commit to the long term.

"Right now, we are still taking this one day at a time," he said. "So far, we are happy with the support that we are getting from the south Winnipeg Jewish community [where more than half the city's Jewish population now lives]."

Odwak said his family played no role in the dispute between the Vaad and Omnitsky. "We don't want to see anybody lose his business," he added.

Both Gekht and Aronovitch said they are happy to see competition in the city's kosher meat business once again.

"Competition is very good for the customers," said Gekht, who was bringing in kosher meat from Shefa Meats in Toronto during the time he and the Vaad were estranged.

Anecdotal evidence over the past two months indicated that most Omnitsky customers in the north end would have continued to shop there or looked to the supermarkets for non-kosher meat if the dispute had not been resolved. One IGA store a few blocks north of Omnitsky did try to fill the void by bringing in some kosher meat from Toronto on a trial basis. Now that Omnitsky has WK certification again, it's quite likely that most of the store's north end customers will continue to support the business.

But with new competition, others are considering their options.

The Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, a north Winnipeg Jewish seniors drop in centre, had previously ordered its meat from Omnitsky. When the shop lost its hechsher, the centre looked to Shefa to fill its meat orders. Now, executive director Marilyn Regiec said she is looking at Shefa, Hali's and Omnitsky and will order from the supplier with the best prices.

Praying man removed from Air Canada flight

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Air Canada Jazz spokesperson denied that an Orthodox Jewish man was removed from a Montreal flight bound for New York City because he was praying, as has been reported.

Manon Stuart said the unidentified man was escorted off the plane because the crew "was unable to verify visually or verbally that he was complying with safety regulations" before take-off. The crew could not communicate with the man because he apparently did not understand English or French, she said.

Stuart said there were a few complaints from other passengers about the man's behaviour, but that was not the reason for removing him.

While she did not know the exact details of the incident, she said it is possible the flight attendants could not see if the man's seat belt was fastened because he was wearing a prayer shawl. (According to a reported eyewitness account from a nearby passenger, Yves Faguy, the man had a "sort of cover over his head" and was reading a book.)

The incident occurred Sept. 1 at Pierre Elliott Trudeau Airport. The plane had just left the gate for its 9 a.m. departure when the crew decided to remove the man from the plane, Stuart said, in order to find a translator.

A Hebrew translator was found within an hour and the airline was satisfied that the man understood what was required of passengers in preparation for take-off. The man was put aboard the next Jazz flight to New York between 1½ to two hours later, Stuart said.

Jews praying on board flights between Montreal and New York is not an uncommon occurrence.

"It is a delicate situation. We try to find a balance between respect for cultural diversity and ensuring the safety of all passengers. Safety must come first," she said.

Stuart said the airline is conducting an internal review of the "very unfortunate" incident "to see if it could have been handled differently."

CBC reported a quite different account of the incident based on what Faguy said he saw. Faguy said the man was not loud and did not seem to be bothering anyone, but a flight attendant approached the man and told him his behaviour was making other passengers nervous.

"The attendant actually recognized out loud that he wasn't a Muslim and that she was sorry for the situation but they had to ask him to leave," Faguy was quoted as saying.

Couple lived in own home until 2005

For their honeymoon, the couple boarded a train for Minneapolis without bringing any food along.

"We were young and naive," he recalled. "A Jewish fellow on the train recognized that we were newlyweds and treated us to two corned beef sandwiches and a bottle of Wynola. That was our wedding feast."

Fred spent 33 years on the road as a commercial traveller.

After he retired in 1968, Gertie persuaded him to take a creative writing course at the University of Winnipeg. That led to a second career for Fred as a writer and raconteur. He said he has written 65 short stories, many of which have been published in Winnipeg's Jewish Post & News over the years.

For many years, Fred and Gertie were very active in the community in seniors and Yiddish activities.

They were among the founders of the Stay Young Club, a Jewish seniors group that was started at the YMHA more than 25 years ago and still meets Tuesdays at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. Fred also sang in the Stay Young Choir for many years.

They have also been active in the Mamaloshen group and the United Jewish People's Organization.

The couple lived in their own home in north Winnipeg for more than 50 years, until the summer of 2005. Because of advancing Alzheimer's disease, Gertie was admitted into the Sharon Home. Shortly thereafter, Fred suffered a mild stroke. Although he has completely recovered, he also moved into the Sharon Home from the hospital.

"We are millionaires," Fred said at the anniversary party. "We have one son and one daughter, one grandson and one granddaughter and one great-grandson and one great-granddaughter, a lot of friends and a wonderful place to live. Who could ask for anything more?"

Fred said he and Gertie are happy in the Sharon Home. Gertie still enjoys playing the piano, while Fred is still able to get out and about. He attends the weekly Stay Young program, for example.

"We've made the Sharon Home our home," he said. "The staff is wonderful, the meals are excellent and there are programs every day."

He noted that he also enjoys reading his stories to fellow residents.

Holiday Food Ideas

Traditional dishes with some new twists

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

With the first crisp breeze at summer's close, I am filled with memories. Colour war games and the end of camp. The smell of newly sharpened pencils. New school clothes, and for the High Holy Days, a new hat, new gloves, new dresses for each service. Smells of roasting chicken and honey cake wafting downstairs from my grandparents' apartment, where Mama Hinda busily prepares her Erev Rosh Hashanah feast for the onslaught of Rabinowitzes that will soon fill those tiny rooms.

When I choose a menu for the holiday, some traditional dishes that I remember my mother, my aunts and my grandmother preparing beg for inclusion. Would it be Rosh Hashanah without Mama Hinda's majestic spiralled challah or Aunt Sally's tzimmes? But I also like to mix it up with some new twists on the old themes as I explore the new cookbooks of the season.

What a delicious way to celebrate the holidays!

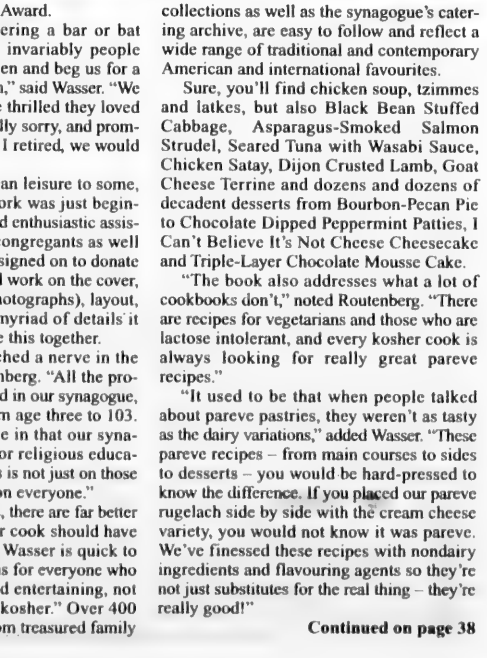
This year, I will be cooking from Divine Kosher Cuisine by Risé Routenberg and Barbara Wasser (Wimmer), the long-awaited, all-volunteer fundraising project of Congregation Agudat Achim in Niskayuna, N.Y.



Routenberg and Wasser draw on their years of experience with As You Like It, the synagogue's kosher catering service, which for decades has been a magnet in the area for all events Jewish, garnering national attention in 2003 when it won the Gold Solomon Schecter Award.

"When we were catering a bar or bat mitzvah or a wedding, invariably people would come in the kitchen and beg us for a recipe for this or that dish," said Wasser. "We would tell them we were thrilled they loved the dish, but we were really sorry, and promised that when Risé and I retired, we would write a cookbook."

Retirement might mean leisure to some, but for these two, the work was just beginning. Fortunately they had enthusiastic assistance from almost 150 congregants as well as local businesses who signed on to donate recipes and test them and work on the cover, art (over 200 luscious photographs), layout, publicity, etc. – all the myriad of details it takes to put a project like this together.

"This cookbook touched a nerve in the community," said Routenberg. "All the proceeds go to education, and in our synagogue, that means everyone from age three to 103. We are somewhat unique in that our synagogue does not charge for religious education. We feel that the onus is not just on those who have children; it is on everyone."

Worthy as this cause is, there are far better reasons that every kosher cook should have this cookbook, although Wasser is quick to point out that "this book is for everyone who loves cooking, eating and entertaining, not just for those who keep kosher." Over 400 tried-and-true recipes, from treasured family collections as well as the synagogue's catering archive, are easy to follow and reflect a wide range of traditional and contemporary American and international favourites.

Sure, you'll find chicken soup, tzimmes and latkes, but also Black Bean Stuffed Cabbage, Asparagus-Smoked Salmon Strudel, Seared Tuna with Wasabi Sauce, Chicken Satay, Dijon Crusted Lamb, Goat Cheese Terrine and dozens and dozens of decadent desserts from Bourbon-Pecan Pie to Chocolate Dipped Peppermint Patties, I Can't Believe It's Not Cheese Cheesecake and Triple-Layer Chocolate Mousse Cake.

"The book also addresses what a lot of cookbooks don't," noted Routenberg. "There are recipes for vegetarians and those who are lactose intolerant, and every kosher cook is always looking for really great pareve recipes."

"It used to be that when people talked about pareve pastries, they weren't as tasty as the dairy variations," added Wasser. "These pareve recipes – from main courses to sides to desserts – you would be hard-pressed to know the difference. If you placed our pareve rugelach side by side with the cream cheese variety, you would not know it was pareve. We've finessed these recipes with nondairy ingredients and flavouring agents so they're not just substitutes for the real thing – they're really good!"

Cooks will especially appreciate the traditional and updated sample menus for Shabbat and the Jewish holidays and the tips for entertaining large groups that evolved from years of catering experience.

"Start warming everything up much earlier than you think is necessary," advised Wasser. "Cover your dishes well and warm them at 350. Then turn the heat down to 250. We have found you won't dry things out, but if your dish does need a little extra moisture, add a little water and rotate the dishes in and out of the oven.

"Most of our recipes you can prepare and freeze ahead. Keep last-minute things to a minimum so that you can relax and enjoy your company."

FRAGRANT CARROT SOUP WITH INDIAN SPICES

½ cup olive oil
2 large onions, chopped
2 tbsp. brown sugar, firmly packed
1 tsp. ground coriander
2 tbsp. curry powder
½ tsp. ground cardamom
⅛ tsp. ground nutmeg
2 lb. carrots, peeled and chopped
4 medium potatoes, peeled and chopped
3 quarts vegetable broth
salt and pepper to taste
cilantro, mint leaves or nondairy sour cream for garnish

Heat oil in soup pot and sauté onions until soft but not browned. Add sugar and spices and cook 1 minute.

Add carrots, potatoes and broth and bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer 30 minutes or until vegetables are soft. Add salt and pepper. Cool and puree.

Serve soup hot or at room temperature, and garnish. Makes 12 servings.

Hint: For a lower fat version, reduce oil to ⅓ cup.

CURRIED APPLE-SQUASH RINGS

6 tbsp. butter for dairy, divided (use margarine for pareve)
1 large onion, chopped
1½ tbsp. curry powder, divided
2 large Granny Smith apples, peeled and diced
⅔ cup apple juice
½ cup dried currants
salt and pepper to taste
2 acorn squash, cut into 1-in. rings and seeded

Preheat oven to 350. Grease cookie sheets. Heat 1 tbsp. butter or margarine in large skillet and sauté onions until soft. Stir in 1 tbsp. curry powder, apples, juice and currants. Simmer until liquid evaporates. Season with salt and pepper.

Melt remaining butter or margarine in saucepan, add remaining curry powder and stir until fragrant, to make curry glaze.

Arrange squash rings in single layer on sheets. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Place scoop of filling into centre of each squash ring. Drizzle with curry glaze. Cover with foil and bake until tender, about 45 minutes. Transfer to platter with spatula to serve. Makes 8 servings.

BULGARIAN CHICKEN

Sauce
½ cup olive oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
3 tbsp. red wine vinegar
2 garlic cloves, minced
3 tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley
1 tsp. dried dill
1 tsp. dried rosemary
salt and pepper to taste

Whisk together sauce ingredients.

Chicken
5 medium potatoes, peeled and coarsely chopped
5 medium tomatoes, peeled and coarsely chopped
3½ lb. chicken, cut into eighths or 6 chicken breasts, boned and skinned
1 tsp. paprika

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 9x13-in. baking pan. Place potatoes and tomatoes in pan, cover with chicken and brush with half the sauce. Sprinkle with paprika. Bake uncovered 20 minutes.

Baste with remaining sauce and bake until tender. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

APPLE-HONEY DESSERT PIZZA

9-in. unbaked pie shell
flour for dusting
¼ cup honey
1 cup applesauce
2 medium apples, peeled and thinly sliced
⅓ cup ground nuts
¼ cup raisins
¼ cup sugar
½ tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 400. Grease cookie sheet or pizza pan. Remove pie crust from foil pan, dust lightly with flour and roll into 12-in. circle directly on sheet or pan.

Crimp edge of dough to form rim, prick with fork and brush with honey. Cover with applesauce to rim. Top with apple slices in concentric circles.

Sprinkle with nuts and raisins. Combine sugar and cinnamon and sprinkle over top. Bake 20 minutes or until crust is firm and golden brown. Cut into wedges.

Hint: Add chocolate mini-chips, nuts or finely chopped maraschino cherries. Makes 12 slices.

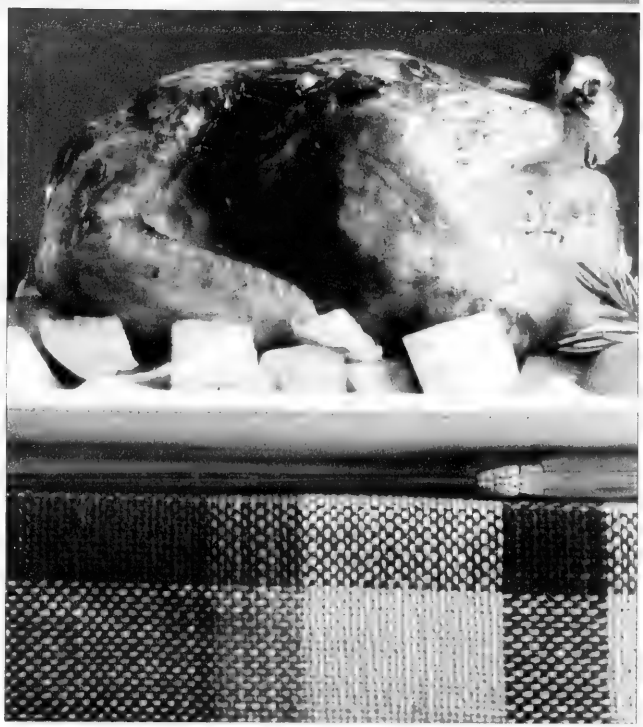
Lighten things up with side dishes

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN



During the High Holy Days, I'm as traditional as they come. I love the heady perfume of simmering chicken soup. I make way too many matzah balls (and can never quite get them heavy enough for my husband's liking). I serve both brisket and chicken.

Where I like to lighten things up, however, is in the side courses and the desserts. This menu represents this personal pattern in that the salad is refreshingly tangy and citrusy and a pleasant change from the heaviness of the meat. The brisket is deliciously dark and can be made up to 48 hours ahead. And although I tend to serve an apple dessert as well, the apricot raspberry linzer torte is a tart alternative as well as a bitter-sweet nod to the last lingering days of summer produce.

BIBB LETTUCE SALAD WITH GRAPEFRUIT, AVOCADO AND PISTACHIOS

2 large heads butter or bibb lettuce
2 large red grapefruit
1 ripe avocado
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1/4 cup pistachios, toasted and coarsely chopped

Dressing:
2 tbsp. grapefruit or orange juice
2 tbsp. sherry vinegar
2 tsp. honey
2 tsp. Dijon mustard
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil

Wash and dry the lettuce. Tear lettuce into bite size pieces (you should have about 10 cups) and place in serving bowl.

Cut off peel and pith from both grapefruits. Holding grapefruit over a bowl to catch its juices, cut out segments; set aside to drain on paper towels. Peel avocado and cut into cubes; toss with lemon juice and set aside. (All of the above can be prepared up to 4 hours in advance.)

Dressing: In bowl, whisk together juice, vinegar, honey, mustard, salt and pepper. Gradually whisk in oil until well emulsified. (Dressing can be made up to 2 days ahead. Bring to room temperature before serving.)

To serve, toss together lettuce, grapefruit segments, avocado and dressing. Sprinkle pistachios over. Makes 8 servings.

BEEF SHORT RIBS IN WINE AND BALSAMIC SAUCE

6 lb. beef short ribs
¼ cup all purpose flour
1½ tsp. smoked paprika
1 tsp. dried thyme
1 tsp. each salt and pepper
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 cups dry red wine
1 cup beef stock
4 carrots, peeled and cut into large chunks
2 stalks celery, cut into large chunks
2 onions, peeled and quartered
4 cloves garlic
2 each sprigs fresh rosemary and thyme
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar

In shallow bowl or plate, combine flour, paprika, thyme, salt and pepper. Coat beef ribs on both sides in mixture, and reserve leftover flour. Heat oil in skillet set over medium heat. Brown ribs well on each side, transferring to large roasting pan as finished. Skim off any extra fat. Sprinkle remaining flour in pan; whisk for 1 minute. Pour in red wine and stock. Bring to boil. Boil for 5 minutes. Let cool.

Arrange carrots, celery, onions and garlic around ribs in roasting pan. Lay herb sprigs over meat. Pour cooled wine mixture over. Cover with aluminum foil and refrigerate for 24 hours.

Bake in centre of preheated oven at 325, basting occasionally, for 3 hours or until ribs are very tender and meat is falling off the bones. Transfer to serving dish; cover with foil to keep warm.

Strain liquid, discarding all vegetables and herbs. Spoon off any excess fat. Pour liquid into pot; pour in vinegar. Bring to boil; boil for 5 minutes or until thickened and shiny. Pour sauce over ribs to serve. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

APRICOT RASPBERRY LINZER TORTE

Filling:
2 cups fresh or frozen apricots, washed and pitted, and sliced
⅔ cup apricot jam
¼ cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch
1 cup fresh or frozen raspberries
1 egg, lightly beaten

Pie Crust:
1¼ cups all purpose flour
½ cup ground pecans
½ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
1 cups stick margarine, frozen
¼ cold water

Crust: Place flour, pecans, salt and brown sugar in bowl of food processor. Pulse to aerate. Cut in margarine. Pulse until mixture resembles coarse meal with a few larger pieces. Pour in water; pulse just until mixture starts to hold together but is not yet formed into a ball. Transfer mixture to counter; knead very lightly until in a ball. Halve and flatten into 2 discs. Wrap in plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 2 hours or for up to 24 hours.

Filling: In saucepan, combine apricots, jam, sugar and cornstarch. Bring to boil; reduce heat and gently boil, stirring occasionally for 5 to 8 minutes or until thickened. Transfer to bowl. Cover surface directly with plastic wrap; refrigerate for at least 8 hours or for up to 24 hours.

On lightly floured surface, roll out half of dough to 10-inch circle. Fit into 9-inch tart pan with removable bottom. Spread apricot filling in shell. Sprinkle with raspberries. Brush egg over rim.

Roll out remaining dough to 9½-in. circle. With plain pastry tip or ¼-in. cookie cutter, cut out small holes from pastry. Roll up pastry around rolling pin and unroll on top of filling, pressing rim to adhere. Trim excess pastry off. Brush egg all over surface of pastry.

Bake in centre of preheated 375 oven for about 45 minutes or until pastry is golden and filling is bubbling. Let cool completely in pan on rack. Makes 8 servings.

Rabbis in the kitchen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If you're looking for a recipe for curried cholent; low-fat crispy schnitzel; or barley risotto with shiitake and oyster mushrooms, onions, and sweet red peppers, try asking Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, spiritual leader of Beth Torah Congregation.

When he was growing up in Toronto in a family of nine children, his mother Minna always let them cook, he says. "We would often have guests at our dinner table and she trained us to be efficient.

Rabbi Yossi Sapirman

"We would have six things going at once – two in the oven, three on the stove top and a huge bowl of rising challah."

To this day, he says, she still loves new recipes. "She is always trying something new, and she trained us to experiment. How many kids knew about black strap molasses? She would use it in her wholewheat bread."

The rabbi, who eats chicken and fish but not red meat, says he and his siblings were always part of their mother's kitchen. "We would lick the bowl, preview the next day's menu and try her experiments. The food was much more than physical nourishment; it had far more meaning."

Particularly at Rosh Hashanah, says Rabbi Sapirman, food takes on deep significance. "When we blow the shofar, we say that it is the world's birthday, and it is important to acknowledge the birthday by partaking in seasonal fruits and vegetables. They are the offspring of the earth.

"It's also time to slow down and take stock of the year, and there's no better way to do that than with some slow cooking. Start every dish from scratch, and appreciate that moment in life."

In celebrating the world's birthday, he says, it is a good time to bring the world's influence into our cooking. "Discover what other Jews are eating. What are Syrian or Indian Jews preparing for the holidays? When I think about that, it connects me spiritually to communities around the world."

Cook slowly with spiritual meaning

God looks down on us, he says, "but we are the caretakers. By cooking healthy and nourishing food we are sanctifying the world.

"Food is an instrument of health and wellness. We need to think about that during Rosh Hashanah when we are taking stock of our lives.

"And speaking of stock, there is nothing like soup stock to make food more flavourful. When I make stir fry, I reduce some stock, add in a little sugar-free jam, and I've created a sauce."

When making barley risotto, he says, he starts by cooking two cups of barley in a crock pot. "Meanwhile I stir fry a sweet vadalia onion, red pepper, and chopped yellow and green zucchinis. Then I add coarsely chopped shiitake and oyster mushrooms, so they just flash in the pan.

"Add that to barley, then pan fry some spicy chicken sausage chopped into one-inch pieces. Squeeze the juice of one lemon into the pan, turn off the heat, and let it sit so it continues to cook.

"Add to barley, squeeze in more lemon juice, and then salt and pepper. This can be served hot or cold."

He finds cooking relaxing, Rabbi Sapirman says. "Listening to music while I cook is a sensory experience that is unparalleled. I use my sense of touch, smell and sight, and my creative juices flow. There is also a sense of anticipation. Cooking can be a romantic activity for one."

Rabbis Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Sean Gorman of Beth Tzedec Congregation agree that being involved in the preparation of yom tov and Shabbat meals is a mitzvah.

"Everyone is supposed to be engaged in the shopping and preparation of food – not just the women," says Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

Rabbi Gorman tries to leave shul every Friday afternoon by noon, he says, in order to get home in time to bake the challah. His wife Jennifer, also a rabbi, "is just not as happy with anyone else's challah. The secret is honey."

'Fire-and-forget' cooking for busy family

He learned to bake by necessity, he says, while he was a U.S. naval chaplain on duty in Hawaii, and the local bakery was not under kosher supervision.

Shabbat and holiday menus at their home depend largely on who is doing the cooking, he says. "I enjoy cooking Middle Eastern cuisine, and Jennifer likes European, so you always know who has done the cooking.

"If I were cooking the Rosh Hashanah meal, I would prepare a Moroccan-type dish such as a vegetable stew with couscous. My wife would be more likely to cook brisket."

Their three children, ages nine, six and four, are starting to take an interest in cooking, he says. "It's a lot of fun for them to help in the preparations."

With their hectic lifestyle, he says, they concentrate on dishes that are not labour intensive. "We call them fire-and-forget. It's a marine term. You put it in the oven and forget about it until it's ready. If I need to write and cook on Friday afternoon, fire-and-forget dishes are great."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who kneads the Shabbat challah in a bread maker, says he uses one part multi-grain flour to four parts of unbleached flour. "Sometimes I add raisins or chocolate chips for fun."

His family – he and his wife Josette have three boys ages 22, 19 and 16 – usually have company for Rosh Hashanah lunch, he says.

"My wife does the shopping, and I do the cooking. A typical menu would include wine, challot, gefilte fish and brisket or standing rib roast.

"We buy frozen fish and cook it with celery, carrots and sugar. It's very good, and quick. We're always concerned about moving quickly," says Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who eats fish but not red meat or chicken.

Among the favourite side dishes at their home are mashed yams with maple syrup and topped with marshmallows, and Jerusalem kugel made with caramelized sugar.

For Sukkot, he says, he may cook a rice medley with dates, figs and raisins.

Some of his best sermons have evolved while he was cooking, he says. "I often go back and forth between writing and cooking, and I have turned rice into a sermon. I told [my congregants] that just as a pinch of saffron rice can flavour an entire recipe, a small gesture can affect an entire life."

There is much more to food than physical sustenance, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl says. "It should taste good and impart meaning."

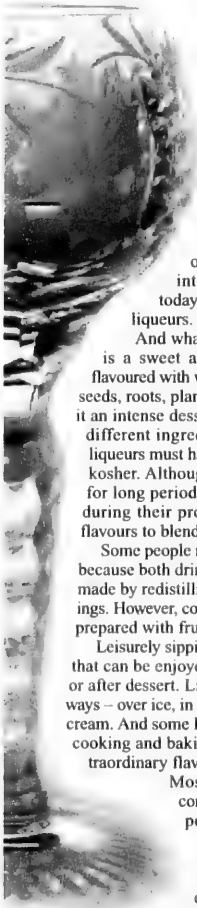
Liqueurs… a sweet treat for a sweet Shanah Tovah



Today, people are becoming very knowledgable about fine wines from around the world and the many factors involved in their production.

But what about fine liqueurs? Where do they come from and how are they produced? The word "liqueur" is derived from the Latin "liquifacere," meaning to dissolve, and it's the delicate process of dissolving many flavourings into one another that produces today's large variety of exciting, tasty liqueurs.

And what exactly is a liqueur? A liqueur is a sweet alcoholic beverage that can be flavoured with wine, fruits, herbs, spices, flowers, seeds, roots, plants, barks and even cream to give it an intense dessert-like taste. Because so many different ingredients are blended together, all liqueurs must have certification to be considered kosher. Although liqueurs are not usually aged for long periods, they can have resting periods during their production to allow their various flavours to blend and marry each other.

Some people may refer to a liqueur as a cordial because both drinks are highly sweetened and are made by redistilling spirits with aromatic flavourings. However, cordials, unlike liqueurs, are usually prepared with fruit pulp or juices.

Leisurely sipping a fine liqueur is a special treat that can be enjoyed after dinner as well as during or after dessert. Liqueur can be served in different ways – over ice, in cocktails, coffee or poured on ice cream. And some liqueurs can even be added while cooking and baking to give specific foods an extraordinary flavour.

Most liqueurs have lower alcohol content than liquor, usually 15 to 30 per cent, although some have as much as 55 per cent.

An excellent liqueur, just like a superb wine, can enhance every table and special occasion. New this year are some quality kosher liqueurs.

The famous Herman Jansen kosher parve liqueurs, produced under the supervision of the London Beth Din and the OU, are now available in Toronto. Herman Jansen liqueurs are renowned for their excellent quality and outstanding taste. And Herman Jansen is also well-known for being the first company to produce a kosher chocolate mint liqueur! The Curacao Blue and the ever-popular Chocolate Mint are especially pleasing, full of rich flavour, and truly satisfying whenever or however they're served.

With their distinctive, elegant presentation, Herman Jansen liqueurs will impress your host or hostess and delight your family and guests, as well as enhance your assortment of liquor and wines.

This year, outstanding Rosh Hashanah wines from Israel include the Barkan Classic Cabernet Sauvignon with its gorgeous aromas of blackberry, cassis and oak. When you taste this wine, layers of fruit and spice cover the palate, while its well-balanced tannins and acidity maintain a perfect structure. The charming, velvety smooth texture combined with the long, lingering finish makes this red wine a true celebration. The Barkan Classic Chardonnay is a full-bodied white wine with pear and citrus fruit flavours.

From Israel's impressive Efrat Winery is the Cabernet Sauvignon-Merlot, 2004, a bronze medal winner, and described by Daniel Rogov, the country's internationally respected wine authority, as being "young, fresh and lively, with soft tannins and an appealing berry-cherry personality. Hints of spices and Mediterranean herbs add complexity. Drink now." The Shiraz, 2004, is delicious 100 per cent Israeli Shiraz, a fruity wine with pleasant plum and wild berry fruits, as well as intense red colour and lovely purple hues. On the palate, it exhibits full-bodied wine with fine, ripe tannins complemented by French oak.

All liqueurs and wines are available at the LCBO. Agent Mazel Wines.

Holiday Food Ideas

Honey cake a holiday tradition for many

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Whether you're Ashkenazi or Sephardi, honey cake and the holidays are synonymous. I've developed quite a repertoire of interesting and different honey cake recipes, some of which are dairy and can, for the most part, be converted to pareve with a few minor substitutions.

SPICY HONEY CAKE WITH CRANBERRIES

2¼ cups flour
1 tsp. ground cloves
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
¼ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
¼ tsp. cream of tartar
¼ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
6 tbsp. (¾ stick) margarine or butter, melted
1½ tbsp. oil
3 tbsp. packed dark brown sugar
1 tbsp. white sugar
3 large eggs, beaten
1½ cups honey
1 cup sour cream
1 cup dried cranberries or sour cherries
1 cup chopped walnuts or pecans
sliced almonds for garnish

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour a 12-cup bundt or 10-in. tube pan, tapping out the excess flour, and set aside. In a bowl, sift together the flour, spices, cream of tartar, baking soda, and salt. With an electric mixer in another bowl, beat together the melted margarine or butter, oil, and both sugars in a large mixing bowl until well blended.

Beat in the eggs, one at a time, then add the honey and sour cream all at once and beat until you have a smooth batter. Beat in the flour mixture, 1 cup at a time, beating well after each addition. Fold in the cranberries and walnuts. Pour the batter into the prepared cake pan.

Bake the cake until a cake tester inserted near the centre comes out clean, 45 to 50 minutes. Invert the cake onto a wire rack and let cool. As soon as the cake is cool enough to handle, press the flaked almonds into the top. Place the cooled cake in an airtight container to ripen for 2 days before serving. Serves 8 to 10.

CLASSIC HONEY CAKE

3 cups flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. baking soda
1 tbsp. instant coffee
½ cup boiling water
¼ cup oil
1 cup honey
zest (grated peel) of one orange
2 tbsp. any whiskey
4 eggs
1 cup sugar
1 cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 325. In a bowl, combine the flour, baking powder, cinnamon and baking soda and set it aside. Mix the instant coffee with the water, blend in the oil, honey, orange zest and whiskey.

In a large bowl, beat the eggs until frothy, gradually add the sugar and beat until light. Add to the honey mixture. Combine the flour mixture alternately with the honey mixture, starting with the flour and ending with flour.

Stir in the walnuts. Pour the batter into an oiled and waxed paper-lined 13 x 9x 2-in. baking pan. Bake for about 50 minutes. Test for doneness with a toothpick. If the toothpick comes out clean and dry the cake is done. If moist, keep baking until the toothpick comes out clean. Turn the cake upside down onto a wire rack. Cool. Peel off the waxed paper and wrap in aluminum foil to keep fresh. Serves 8 to 10.

SHELLIE'S PISTACHIO AND APRICOT HONEY CAKE

My friend Shellie sent this recipe to me last year and everyone I served it to raved about its rich pistachio flavour and the tangy apricot taste.

oil and flour to prepare the baking pan
3½ cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. ground cloves
½ tsp. cardamom
½ tsp. salt
½ cup boiling water
2 cups honey
¼ cup oil
1 tbsp. plus one tsp. lemon juice
zest of 1 lemon
4 large eggs
1 cup sugar
1 cup shelled pistachio nuts, roughly chopped
1½ cups dried apricots, cut into ¼-in. pieces

Preheat oven to 325. (Note: If using a single oven, place one rack in the centre of the oven and the other above it, allowing enough room in between for the height of the loaf pans. If a double oven is available, preheat both ovens.)

Line two 9 x 5-in. loaf pans with foil. Coat the foil with oil and flour, shaking out excess flour. Coat a 12-muffin tin with the oil and flour mixture, omitting the foil step.

Combine the flour, baking powder, baking soda, spices and salt in a bowl. In a separate bowl or cup, stir the boiling water into the honey. Add the oil, lemon juice and lemon zest, stirring to combine.

In an electric mixer, beat the eggs and the sugar until light and fluffy. Starting and ending with the flour, alternately add the flour and the honey mixture to the eggs and sugar.

Stir in the apricots and pistachios. Pour the batter into the large pans, filling them three-fourths of the way. Distribute the remaining batter evenly among the muffin cups. Place a cookie sheet on the oven racks. Bake the loaves on the cookie sheets for about 1 hour and 10 minutes or until a tester in the centre comes out clean. Let the cakes cool in the pans on a cooling rack.

As the loaves have finished baking, place the muffin tin in the centre rack of the oven and bake for 30-35 minutes, or until a tester comes out clean. Run a knife around the edges of the muffins and invert them on the rack to cool. Makes 2 cakes and 12 muffins.

Carrot tzimmes with a slight difference

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

For many of us, the onset of fall feels like a time of renewal. A new school year has just begun and we're getting back to a sense of order and reality after the often lazy pace of summer. Our thoughts turn to Rosh Hashanah and planning for it both spiritually and physically.

As with every other Jewish holiday, food plays a central role and is laden with symbolism.

The choice of produce for the Rosh Hashanah meals differs somewhat depending on whether one is Ashkenazi or Sephardi. Ashkenazi dishes traditionally feature apples, carrots, sweet potatoes, beets and other foods native to eastern Europe. Sephardi dishes feature foods like apricots, dates, pumpkins and turnips, foods common to the Middle East. Both make liberal use of leeks, zucchini and other produce that is plentiful in the early fall.

The foods served emphasize Rosh Hashanah's optimistic spirit and our hope for a sweet New Year, and thus sweet foods are called for and salty or bitter foods omitted.

There are those who like to serve gastronomic meals for Rosh Hashanah and those who prefer the traditional dishes. There was a time that I tried to serve very different and interesting dishes for the holidays, but as I grew older, I became much more traditional in my menus. But I still try to add one dish each year that is different for my family.

CARROT AND SWEET POTATO TZIMMES

This is an Ashkenazi standard. It's delicious any time of the year but the combination of carrots, sweet potatoes and dried fruits make it especially appropriate for Rosh Hashanah.

2 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, chopped
5 large carrots, thinly sliced
1 large can sweet potatoes or 3 large sweet potatoes
1 small can applesauce
½ cup chopped prunes
¼ cup chopped dried apricots
½ cup orange juice
1½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger
½ tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 350. If using fresh sweet potatoes, cook in the microwave in their skins, then peel and slice. Heat oil in a large skillet. Saute the onions until they are translucent. Add the carrots and continue to cook until onions and carrots are golden.

In a mixing bowl, combine the onion-carrot mixture with all the remaining ingredients. Mix thoroughly and don't worry if the potato slices break apart. Transfer the mixture to a large shallow baking dish that has been greased. Bake for 45-50 minutes, or until the top begins to turn slightly crusty. Serves 8.

CRANBERRY SHIMMER

A refreshing addition to any meal, this can be served as a side dish or as a light dessert after the heavy holiday meal. An attractive way to serve it is to top it with frosted raw cranberries and fresh mint. To frost the cranberries, dip each berry into egg white and roll in granulated sugar. Set aside to dry before using.

1 6-oz. package raspberry gelatin
2½ cups boiling water
¼ cup lemon juice
1 cup diced celery
1 cup crushed pineapple, drained
2 16-oz. cans whole cranberry sauce
½ cup pecans, chopped (optional)

Thoroughly dissolve gelatin in boiling water. Add lemon juice and refrigerate until mixture begins to set. Remove from refrigerator and mix in celery, pineapple, cranberry sauce, and pecans if using. Pour into a 2-quart mould and refrigerate until completely set. This recipe can also be made in eight individual one-cup moulds. Serves 8.

The fish head may not be everyone's choice

By JOSIE AARONSON-GELB
Special to The CJN

My 12-year-old cousin Hannah thinks that for Rosh Hashanah an appetizer of chocolate bars fulfils the same symbolic purpose as apples and honey – sweetness for a sweet New Year. Not a bad argument. But this Rosh Hashanah, I'm ignoring all pre-teen pleas and getting back to original culinary traditions. I'm talking about fish heads.

Fish heads have long been part of the Rosh Hashanah feast. There's an obvious symbolism to this practice: Rosh Hashanah literally translated means "Head of the Year." But fish heads also represent our hope that this New Year we will be leaders ("heads" of the fish), not followers ("tailing" behind).

Finding a fish head, while not problematic in shopping terms, did pose a problem when it came to menu planning. There are plenty of fish head soup recipes out there and even some fish head curries. But try generating excitement around a family dinner where the main tour de force is a simmered fish head. Strikes were threatened.

So this Rosh Hashanah we're indulging in fish bodies (on which there was once a head). Apples and honey though, those will remain in their pure form. Some traditions are not to be messed with.

GRILLED FISH SKEWERS WITH COCONUT CURRY

2 cloves garlic
2 tbsp. honey
¼ cup Dijon mustard
¼ cup olive oil
¼ cup + 1 tsp. apple cider vinegar, divided
¼ cup + 2 tbsp. tarragon leaves, divided
2 lb. tuna, monkfish, or halibut fillets, cut into 1-in. chunks
2 tbsp. butter
2 large tart green apples, peeled, cored, cut into ½-in. pieces
1 tsp. madras curry powder
1 cup coconut milk
1 tsp. brown sugar
salt and pepper

Prepare barbecue or pre-heat gas grill to medium-high heat. In a processor, pulse garlic, honey, Dijon, olive oil, ¼ cup of apple cider vinegar and ¼ cup of tarragon leaves until tarragon and garlic are roughly chopped.

Place fish in a large Tupperware or bowl. Pour tarragon marinade over fish and toss to coat. Marinate 15 minutes or up to 1 hour.

Meanwhile, in a skillet, melt butter and sauté apples and curry powder for 5 minutes. Add coconut milk. Simmer for 3 minutes. Add brown sugar, remaining 1 tsp. of apple cider vinegar, remaining 2 tbsp. tarragon leaves, salt and pepper. Stir and keep warm.

Thread fish onto 6 metal skewers, about 5 chunks per skewer. Season fish skewers with salt and pepper. Grill until fish chunks are just opaque in centre, turning occasionally, about 5 minutes.

Serve fish over rice and top with warm curry mixture. Serves 6.

HONEY LEMON SQUARES

½ cup plus ⅓ cup all-purpose flour, divided
½ cup sweet, flaked coconut
2 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
¼ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. ground cloves
7 tbsp. cold butter
½ tsp. grated lemon zest
4 large eggs
¼ cup granulated sugar
½ cup honey
¼ cup fresh lemon juice
powdered sugar for dusting

Preheat oven to 350. Combine ½ cup flour, coconut, brown sugar, salt and cloves in processor; blend 5 seconds. Add butter and lemon zest. Process until mixture resembles fine meal and begins to clump together. Scatter dough evenly over bottom of greased 9-in. square baking pan. With a metal spatula, press dough down to form a uniform crust over the bottom of the pan. Bake crust until golden at edges, about 20 minutes.

While crust is baking, whisk together eggs and granulated sugar until combined well. Stir in honey and lemon juice. Whisk in remaining ⅓ cup flour. Pour lemon mixture over hot crust and reduce oven temperature to 300. Bake in middle of oven until set, 30-40 minutes. Cool completely in pan and cut into 16 bars. Bar cookies will keep (covered and chilled) for 3 days. Dust with powdered sugar before serving. Makes 16 bars.

Reunion marks century of Jewish life in Nfld.

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

ST JOHNS, Nfld. — More than 80 former and present Newfoundlanders celebrated their Jewish heritage at a gala mid-August reunion in St. John's.

Guests arrived from as far as Israel, Texas and western Canada to enjoy the hospitality that many of them knew as youngsters.

Organized and directed by a small committee led by Claire Frankel Salama, president of Beth El Congregation, and its past president, Michael Paul, the event, called "Kum Ahaym," celebrated more than 100 years of Jewish life in the province.

"One of the highlights was a Shacharit service held at Cape Spear, the nearest point in North America to Jerusalem, on a brilliant Sunday morning just after sunrise," said Doug Wilansky, now living in Toronto, whose father was spiritual leader of the Newfoundland community from 1922 to 1949. Doug, and Messod Salama, head of the Spanish department at Memorial University in St. John's, blew shofars to herald the day.

Like many young Newfoundlanders in the 1950s and '60s, Wilansky left the province to further his education. He earned a medical degree from Dalhousie University and was later a teacher at the McGill University and University of Toronto medical schools.

"I personally was moved to tears by the spirit of this event and the dedication to Jewish continuity generated by a handful of Jews in a distant and isolated part of Canada," Wilansky said. The St. John's Jewish community currently has about 25 families.

Claire Salama spoke of Sherwin Wilansky, a Lubavitch man who left at age 10 to attend yeshiva. "His father died while he was away, and he never returned until the Kum Ahaym. He saw his father's grave for the first time."

Douglas Wilansky of Toronto blows the shofar at the end of a shacharit service at World War II-era bunkers in Cape Spear, Nfld. Behind him is Harry Dubow of Dallas, Texas.

Randy Mauskopf, who works in sales for CHUM Radio in Toronto, spent his formative years in Newfoundland and continues to visit "home" and his father, Ernest, and his in-laws, a few times a year.

"I edited the memory book [a publication of recollections by former and present Newfoundlanders]," Mauskopf said. "It was amazing putting it together. There was such a good feeling around it. People from Badger and Corner Brook, and other communities somewhat distant from St. John's, contributed to it. My eyes were really opened to the history of the community and of Jews in Newfoundland."

The five-day, Wednesday-to-Sunday gathering (which ran Aug. 9-13) was an opportunity for people to renew ties. "People might have come back eventually, but this certainly spurred them," Claire Salama said. "Everyone received a memory book, which let everyone know about other families and established links between them all."

Social events were held at the synagogue, as were services Friday night and Saturday morning. "The only fully kosher winery in Canada [Rodrigues Winery of Whitbourne, Nfld.] produced berry wines for us and offered a wine tasting," Claire said.

As well, writer and poet Robin McGrath, a member of the St. John's Jewish community, launched her book, Saltfish and Schmattes: a History of Jews in Newfoundland from 1770 to the Present.

"We held a dinner of Newfoundland cuisine, drew 80 people to an Oneg Shabbat Friday night – and we'll probably never see a number like that again – and held a walking tour of former Jewish business sites," Claire said.

Reunion draws guests from Israel

Claire, who emigrated from Toronto with her husband Messod 21 years ago, said it was "magical to see these people discovering to whom they were related. The enthusiasm of the people when they attended services at what they called 'their synagogue' made me wonder how different our community would have been if these people stayed."

She noted the return of Jeffrey Platt, a transplant surgeon at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., who, while in St. John's, gave a lecture at Memorial University's medical school. He is the grandson of a rabbi who came to St, John's in the 1930s but couldn't make a living in his chosen profession, so he moved inland to Badger, where he operated a general store for a few years before moving to the United States.

Sandra and Ivar Riff of Montreal, left, and Harry Dubow and Sheryl Pearlman were among 80 current and former Jewish Newfoundlanders at the mid-August reunion.

"Many large family groups, including those of Wilansky, Sheffman, Cohen, Plotsky/Platt, Nathanson and Dubow, used this [reunion] as a forum for family get-togethers," Wilansky said.

"When you reflect on what might have been and could have been, St. John's would have been a flourishing Jewish centre," Claire Salama added wistfully.

האמת לאמיתה

לא משנה אם דעתכם הפוליטית ימינה או שמאלה, פרו ישראלית או פרו פלשתינאית- שני המשפטים הבאים מסכמים את האמת לאמיתה:

אם הערבים יניחו את נשקם היום- לא תהיה אלימות.
אם היהודים יניחו את נשקם היום-לא תהיה מדינת ישראל.

Regardless of your feelings about the crisis in the Middle East the next two sentences say it all;
If the Arabs put down their weapons today-there will be no more violence.
If the Jews put down their weapons today, there would be no more Israel.

דברים שאסור לשכוח

איציק שכח את יום הנישואין. בחמת זעמה צפרדה אמרה לו בכעס: "מחר בבוקר, כשאני קמה, עומד בחניה משהו שמסוגל לעבור מ-0 ל-200 תוך חמש שניות, וחסר לך שלא!"
על מועד ההלוויה של איציק ביתק שישי תצא הודעה מיוחדת...

כתבה מן הכותל

כתבת סי.אן.אן רואה יהודי זקן מתפלל בכותל במשך שעות ארוכות. היא מראיינת אותו ושואלת למה הוא מתפלל. ענה לה היהודי: "כבר ששים שנה אני מתפלל לשלום בין היהודים והערבים".
"ואיך אתה מרגיש עם המצב הקיים?" מתעניינת העיתונאית.
-"אני מרגיש שאני מדבר לקיר", ענה היהודי.....

מה יהיה

בתוך שלל קולות העליהם כדאי גם להקשיב לכמה קולות שקטים יותר, אך פי כמה יותר חכמים:
אחד משרי החמאס, דוקטור ומדען, אמר לפני שבועות מספר לבני עמו: "תפסיקו לחאשים את הישראלים. הם יצאו מעוה והשאירו לנו חמנת ארץ פרחת, ועכשיו-החמנת כולן הרוסת ומשמשת שטח אימונים לטרוריסטים, וחכל מושחת כי אנחנו נוחנים רוצחים ומשחדים".
רק הזיסטוריה תוכל לשפוט האם המלחמה הזאת הזיזה משהו. מה שברור, החיסקריה הציבורית והעיתונאית היא המשך של הספרטי הלאומי של ישראל, אלופת העולם בבלהבלהבלה.
אבל שישאר ביניע.

Newfoundland teacher nominated for G-G award

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. — Keith Samuelson recognizes his nomination for a 2006 Governor General's Award as an opportunity for global understanding.

The English teacher at Prince of Wales Collegiate in St. John's, Nfld., is one of 25 finalists for the national award for excellence in teaching Canadian history.

He is the only Atlantic Canadian on the list, selected primarily for his major contribution to Holocaust and human rights education in Newfoundland.

In 2000, Samuelson was invited to attend the B'nai Brith-sponsored Holocaust and Hope educators' tour of Germany, Poland and Israel. He has since been awarded a Goethe Fellowship for summer study in Germany and a 2003 fellowship for additional study in Japan for his human rights work.

Although he's not Jewish, Samuelson turned the emotional experience of the B'nai Brith trip into a program of human rights education that has been emulated across the province. It ties together classes in history, technology, science and the arts, as well as voluntary community service. He has also helped Newfoundland playwright Terry Rielly produce his play Some Picnic, the true story of how the father of Rielly's partner escaped the day before the Nazis invaded Belgium.

Keith Samuelson with Holocaust survivor Philip Riteman

Samuelson was also asked to initiate the Asper Foundation program in Newfoundland. The program educates young people about the Holocaust, and Samuelson co-ordinates and accompanies the young people's visits to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

"I've always had humanitarian ideals," says the 53-year-old St. John's native, who received his bachelor's and master's degrees in education from Memorial University in St. John's. "But in 2000, the Holocaust and Hope tour showed me you have to do everything in your power to push those ideals."

His voice rises in excitement as he talks about the Asper tour. "Students and parents, mostly non-Jewish, have readily accepted the program. When the [Asper-sponsored] Canadian Human Rights Museum is completed in Winnipeg, every Grade 9 student in Canada will go there to study the Holocaust and its tragedies and triumphs, and the profound affect human rights has had on Canadian culture."

Samuelson says the intensity of his 2000 trip emphasized how he had to do something to promote human rights.

He says he's also been inspired by events and people closer to home.

"I met [Holocaust survivor] Philip Riteman [of Halifax]. I was teaching a class and there was a knock at the door. There stood Mr. Riteman, tears streaming down his face. He had seen a story of me about my Holocaust education program in that day's newspaper. He was in St. John's on that particular day and wanted to meet me. The vice-principal brought him to my classroom."

Samuelson recalled Riteman grabbing his hand and saying, "Thank you."

"I asked him 'Why, compared to you and what you've been through?' but he called me an angel. I've been called many things, but never that," laughed Samuelson.

"Riteman pulled up his sleeve, showed his camp number tattoo and spoke to the youngsters. He's been back many times since. I've seen the toughest kids in school with tears streaming down their faces after he's finished, which shows we have to continue teaching them about human rights."

The Jewish community of Newfoundland is very supportive of Samuelson's programs in global education and human rights.

"Keith's teaching of Holocaust education has brought this story to countless students who now have a better understanding of this dark period in our history," says Ruth Noel, a member of Jewish Community Havura in St. John's, who, along with Shari Ritter of Beth El Synagogue, Samuelson credits with being of great help to him.

"There are no Holocaust deniers among these students. He is teaching students what happened to us, as well as to others, throughout the last century," Noel says. "He is promoting tolerance, and to be vigilant against hatred of any group. This benefits the Jewish community and all peoples."

Samuelson says that the "nomination is a tribute to the young people I teach. I have optimism for these people, if they are taught well to be humane, and apply it throughout their lives."

Six award finalists will be named shortly. The prizes are to be presented in Ottawa on Sept. 28.

Montreal orphans meet for the last time

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Myer Gordon was not quite three and his older brother five when their father died at just 29 years of age in 1926. Their mother could not cope alone and went back to her native New York where she believed she had a better chance of making a living.

She placed her sons in the Jewish orphanage on Jeanne Mance Street, promising to come back for them as soon as she could. True to her word, she did; but the orphanage officials told her to take only Benny, the eldest, back with her to New York.

"They said, 'Myer is such a good boy, we will keep him.' So I stayed at the orphanage for 10 years. I saw my mother only five or six times over those 10 years," Gordon recalled.

Yet Gordon is not bitter; he feels he had a good upbringing in the orphanage and formed strong bonds with the other boys and girls living there that endure to this day.

The Montefiore Home closed in 1936 when Gordon was 13. High school was not an option anyone offered him. He left the orphanage with a small box that contained all his worldly goods: a crystal set, a pair of gloves and a change of socks.

He got a job in a clothing factory, earning eight cents an hour, and lived with an aunt, until he joined the air force during World War II.

Gordon still has that battered box and, at a recent reunion of the few surviving former residents of his orphanage and another, the Montreal Hebrew Orphans' Home, which was in Westmount, he passed it around to help defray the costs of the breakfast.

Gordon and his wife, Judy, who live in Toronto, have organized reunions for the dwindling numbers of "alumni" for the past 17 years. They say this is the last one. Too many of those who remain are not well enough. Eleven have died in the last year alone.

Several of the 22 who attended the final reunion were over 90, including Max Matt, 95, an orphan from Ukraine, who became a teenaged supervisor at the Montefiore. He was driven in from Hartford, Conn., by his son Barry, insisting on coming one more time despite poor health.

Matt is a beloved figure among the alumni. Although not much older than his charges, he was "a mentor and instilled in us values we've kept all our lives. He encouraged us to do the best we can in life," Gordon said.

Max Alper, 93, and Helen Kovitz, 92, who live in Montreal, were also there. Henry Albert, 89, also made it, and brought regards from his two big brothers, Julius, 98, and Sam, 100, who were both in the orphanage as well.

Judy, who was born in Montreal in 1935, said she had never heard of a Jewish orphanage here until she met Myer, whom she married 24 years ago. She has since devoted much of her time to tracking down the alumni and keeping them in touch. She has become the orphanages' historian and archivist, collecting the alumnis' reminiscences, photos and other memorabilia. It is estimated that 400 children stayed at the two orphanages from 1909-42.

She wrote a book, Four Hundred Brothers and Sisters, and a sequel; and edits a newsletter called The Mishpocha, which today has a mailing list of about 90.

"There are probably more still alive, but they either were never found or did not want to talk about their past," she said.

Judy also created the alumni website, montrealorphanages.com. In the past few years, she has arranged for plaques commemorating the orphanages to be hung at the former sites. The Jeanne Mance building now houses an immigrant services group, and the large Westmount facility is a residence for retired Catholic priests.

The Gordons published and promoted the books themselves, selling over a thousand copies. All proceeds – $4,000 to date – have been given to Jewish Family Services, the successor agency of the Baron de Hirsch Institute which ran the orphanages.

Gordon says she will put out two more newsletters – this fall and in the spring – and that will be it.

Matt told the gathering he left his native Ukraine in 1919 after his mother was killed in a pogrom. He spent a few wretched years in an orphanage in Bucharest, before arriving in Montreal on New Year's Day 1924 with his sister.

"When I learned I had to go to another orphanage, I went berserk. I thought I would be adopted." But the Westmount home turned out to be "a heaven," he said. At the leaving age of 16, Matt was trained to become a supervisor and worked at the Montefiore home.

Having difficulty holding back the tears, Matt said, "My memories of those days are deep, and my emotions are even deeper. How happy I am that we're together again."

About 75 people were at the reunion. Many alumni came with children and grandchildren. Ida Lewis née Sklar, who was at the Montefiore from age seven in 1931 after her mother died, to age 16, was with her two daughters, Marlene Lewis and Neile Schlein.

"I grew up with stories of the orphanage. When I told people my mother grew up in an orphanage, people used to look at me and say, 'Oh, you're poor mother.' But it was a wonderful home life. And Mr. Matt was like family to us," said Marlene.

As a last effort to preserve the orphanages' memory, Judy is trying to find someone to make a documentary. Karen Meyers, a film agent from Chicago who learned about the orphanages from the website, attended the reunion and interviewed some of the alumni. She hopes the material will interest a filmmaker.

Fellowship trains Jews to be future leaders

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Organizers of the Maimonides Leaders Fellowship Program, are getting set to launch the program's fourth year of operation in Canada, and are in the process of recruiting potential Jewish leaders.

The 10-week fellowship – originally founded in 1999 at the University of Michigan – runs on more than 20 campuses in North America. It offers a $500 stipend to Jewish students who attend any college or university in the Greater Toronto Area, regardless of their denomination and level of Jewish knowledge.

The $50-a-week stipend is awarded to students for their time and effort and as compensation for not taking a part-time job.

Participants are expected to attend two-hour classes each week held at either University of Toronto, Ryerson University, York University, Seneca College, McMaster University or University of Guelph.

The sessions will feature lectures by Jewish community leaders who will provide a general understanding of the Torah and offer practical applications of leadership skills.

In addition to classes, the program also includes trips and meetings with many Jewish leaders.

"We are planning on accepting 60 Jewish leaders this term and hope to take even more as the years progress," Rabbi Dovid Zauderer, director of the fellowship at U of T and McMaster, said in a press release.

"We feel that students on campus really just lack the leadership resources necessary to develop themselves and at times feel isolated from local Jewish leaders. Maimonides is designed to fill that gap."

This year, topics include Is there a God and what difference does it make?; The Arab Israeli conflict; and Religion without Science is Blind: Understanding the Symbiotic Roles of Science and Religion.

Rabbi Mark Zelunka, the program's York director, said, "To represent the Jewish people, you have to know what the Jewish people represent."

Classes begin Sept 19 and registration is still open. Those who fail to register for the fall program can apply for the winter program.

For an online application, visit www.mfellowship.com.

For more information contact Rabbi Zauderer at dzauderer@aish.com or Rabbi Mark Zelunka at mzelunka@aish.com.

It has taken five years to make it happen, but as of the start of the 2006-07 school year, Hillel Vancouver now has a presence at the University of Victoria in British Columbia.

This addition to the Hillel International family comes just a year after Hillel Vancouver successfully expanded from the University of British Columbia to Simon Fraser University.

Eyal Lichtmann, the Vancouver Hillel executive director, said that Hillel's goal is to keep the numbers rising and to provide stability and permanency for the Vancouver Jewish community.

Vancouver Hillel was promised a 78-year lease by UBC president Martha Piper as long as Hillel builds a new 10,000 square foot Hillel House in the centre of the UBC campus.

Since Hillel expanded last year to open a 1,300 square foot house on the SFU campus, 200 students there have become involved with the Jewish campus group.

Following the success of this expansion, and after five years of working towards this goal, Vancouver Hillel opened a new site on the campus of British Columbia's third largest university.

Gordon Brandt, a student leader at Hillel UBC for four years, was hired as the Hillel director for UVic.

Lichtmann estimated that 600 Jewish students currently attend UVic, and about 200 students have become involved with Hillel only a week after the doors to the rented, six-bedroom Hillel house located across the street from the campus opened.

But, he added, they are still in the process of signing up students for the year.

"Last December, when we notified students that we intend to expand to UVic in September 2006, over 150 students signed up in less than one week," Lichtmann said.

Although Vancouver Hillel receives funding from a variety of sources including National Jewish Campus Life (United Israel Appeal), Hillel International, Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver as well as individual donors, Lichtmann said that Hillel is hoping to launch a $6-$10 million campaign this year.

"In the past year, Vancouver Hillel has expanded to Simon Fraser University and to UVic. These expansions have attracted an additional 500 new Hillel students in addition to UBC," he said, adding that maintaining the three Hillel houses for the next five years will be a challenge.

AEPi and Delta Pi told to Amplify Israel

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

Members of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) and Delta Pi from York University – a Jewish fraternity and sorority — were part of the 90 students from universities across the United States and Canada who attended the AEPI and Israel Amplified event in Louisville, Ky.

"[The event focused on] Israel advocacy and mobilizing sorority and fraternity members on campus to promote Israel advocacy and to recruit other sorority and fraternity members to advocate for Israel," said Jeff Justiz, member of AEPi at York University who attended the three-day retreat, August 13 to 15.

York University AEPi member Matt Harris, and Delta Pi members, Hailey Pearlston and Daphne Hornstein were also at the convention.

Participants were asked to brainstorm three Israel engagement programs on their campus. However, since fraternities and sororities are not recognized at York University, or at the University of Toronto, programming is very difficult, said Jeremy Braverman, president of the York chapter of AEPi.

"[Groups like] Hillel (A Jewish student group) can't officially have anything to do with us because it's York's policy. But we have off-campus club status," he said. "It means that we're a club and that anytime we want to do anything at York we have to apply and pay a rental fee."

In an email to The CJN, Phillip Brodsky said that AEPi groups were encouraged to co-ordinate "anything [from an] Israeli themed social, to a concert with an Israeli band, a cultural night, a self-defence class taught through the Krav Maga fighting style of the IDF. The list is endless.

"There was workshop time. We broke into groups to work together and come up with programs and ideas for what to do on campus, and at the end of it, we had to come up with three solid programs for the end of the year," said Justiz, noting that because of AEPi's limitations on campus, the group decided it would be best to organize three speaking events.

"[The event] was also a lot about us working together and sharing ideas and networking, [which was] a big point. What stands out the most is the speakers – they were that good," said Justiz.

There were more than 20 speakers at the convention, including U.S attorney Elan Carr, who went to Iraq as a JAG in the U.S. Military to help write the country's new constitution, president elect of Hillel International, Wayne Firestone, Israel's consul general in Philadelphia, Uriel Palti, and New York Congressman Eliot Engel.

"They emphasized that people call us the leaders of tomorrow, but they said that we're actually the leaders of today," said Justiz, who is also the communications chair of the Canadian Federation For Jewish Students.

Currently, AEPi is focusing on its annual recruitment program, Rush and Pledge. Braverman is also excited about the AEPi's newly implemented universal philanthropy commitment over the next five years, which has already pledged $225,000 US to Chai Lifeline – Jewish summer camps in the United States and Israel for children with terminal illnesses, Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem, and the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C.

"I think this is going to be a great year for AEPi… AEPi this year, which is the largest fraternity in Canada, is going to be even better," said Justiz.

BAGS TO ISRAEL: Susan Kendal, project co-ordinator of Tools for Tolerance at Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, sits among more than 200 school bags that were recently shipped to Israel. The bags, which were filled with school supplies and personal hygiene items, were collected in Toronto as part of a drive to aid children from Israel's north who were displaced by the recent war with Hezbollah. The bags also contained personal notes from Canadian children to their Israeli counterparts.

Take action and enjoy the feel-good lift it will bring

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin Librach

Taking action is one of the most powerful and integral parts of coaching and one of the fastest ways you can get unstuck and move from an undesirable state to a desirable one.

As we approach the start of a new Jewish year and a new school year, this is a perfect opportunity to remind ourselves that we can have a fresh, new start and can choose to take some action around a goal or a task we've been putting off, and feel an incredible weight lifting off our shoulders.

So whether it's starting that new hobby you've been wanting to explore for years, sorting out your family photographs that have been piling up all year, or doing a cleanout of the clutter in your home or office, take this beautiful new time of year to start fresh and take some action.

Laura Whitworh, Henry Kimsey House and Phil Sandahl, in their book Co-Active Coaching, write, "One of the things that attracts people to coaching is the emphasis on action, and it is often what draws clients to coaching. They may be competent and successful in many phases of their life, but there is one area where they can't seem to make the changes they want."

How many of us start a new exercise or weight loss program in the new year, with great enthusiasm only to give up a few weeks later because we haven't shared it publicly with anyone? This is why thousands of people do well at weight loss programs where the members all support each other, and so the action leads to sustained and effective change.

The opposite of taking action is procrastinating, and most of us are master procrastinators. As Dorothy Breininger and Debby Bitticks say in their book Time Efficiency Makeover, Own Your Time and Your Life by Conquering Procrastination, procrastinating is the deliberate act of excessive postponing. It is the avoidance of doing a task that needs to be accomplished. And this avoidance can lead to feelings of guilt, inadequacy, depression and self-doubt.

So how do we become unstuck so that we can have more happiness, peace of mind and control over our lives?

Well first, we have to make a regular commitment to the area we want to pursue. And as musicians and athletes know, it is only by daily practice and commitment that you can have the focus to stay on track. Also, partner someone in order to have that support on an ongoing basis.

I often suggest to people who procrastinate about writing to get the first draft done – write something, anything is better than nothing. Just the simple act of writing breaks you out of your inaction, and once the momentum is there and the ball is rolling, you won't be able to stop until it's done. This works beautifully with homework, by the way. Have your children sit down and do something, even if it's only in increments of 15 minutes at a time. Have little rewards built in, (colourful stickers are great for some children). Set deadlines, and they will feel inspired to get the work done on time.

Imagine someone you know in your life who always makes things happen, and when you are about to complete a task that you find difficult, imagine stepping into his or her shoes. What do they do to ensure they get the job done?

To motivate yourself, dwell on your successes not your failures, and use those as a springboard to move forward and take action in the area of your life you are most excited about and want to explore, or alternatively, the area you feel you most need to act on.

Enjoy that exhilarating feeling of taking action and accomplishing something you set out to do. The best cure for procrastination is action, and the only way to face and confront the task at hand is to just do it.

As Theodore Roosevelt said, "In any moment of decision, the best thing you can do is the right thing, the next best thing is the wrong thing and the worst thing you can do is nothing."

One-stop cancer centre opens at JGH

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The new $55.9-million Segal Cancer Centre will treat patients more quickly and efficiently in an environment that is less stressful, hospital officials say.

Described as unique in Quebec for its comprehensive approach to care and integration of research, the centre's philosophy is to follow the patient from diagnosis to cure and recovery or palliative care, at a single, modern facility.

Formally opened at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) last week, the centre provides not only medical treatment, but also psychological and nutritional counselling, rehabilitation, cancer prevention and screening, including genetic testing, social support from volunteers and the possibility of experimental therapies in clinical trials.

The approach is a radical departure from the typical cancer journey for Quebecers, during which patients usually receive the diagnosis from one doctor at his office, then wait – possibly weeks – to see an oncologist in a hospital, and then more time for chemo or radiation therapy someplace else.

The centre is located on four of the 8½ new floors devoted to ambulatory care added to the Cummings Pavilion E on Legare Street. Two floors are for treatment and two for research, a total of almost 85,000 square feet.

The most outstanding physical features are the large picture windows everywhere, especially in the waiting and treatment areas, and the bright lighting. Nursing stations are only a few steps from where patients receive their intravenous treatments. There is no more waiting in the corridors.

In operation since February, the centre is now seeing an average of 60 to 70 out-patients a day for chemotherapy. The centre has no beds: patients requiring admission continue to stay on the 7NW ward. Radiotherapy and the MRI and PET scanners remain in a separate area from the centre because of the special isolation needed.

The centre is named for Leanor and Alvin Segal, the lead donors to the project, first announced three years ago. They contributed $20 million, the largest single gift to the JGH in its 72-year history. Two years ago, the Quebec government announced it would contribute $23.9 million. Most of the rest was raised privately.

The centre's director is Dr. Gerald Batist, chair of McGill University's oncology department and a prominent researcher, who heads a team of more than 30 physicians. The co-director is Lynne McVey, the JGH director of nursing.

The 14 nurses play a key role at the centre. Before treatment begins, each patient and his family are assigned a "nurse navigator," who guides and supports them throughout their care, co-ordinating with other members of the interdisciplinary team. These nurses may be called at any time by the patient.

The Hope and Cope support program is in the centre, and its Wellness Centre, scheduled to open next month, is a block away.

Study takes a look at patients in continuing care

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

How dangerous is it for those needing chronic care to stay in bed all day? Is it, in fact, dangerous at all? Whose decision is it for them to stay in bed anyway – the patients' or the staff's?

These are some of the questions in a study by Mary Fox, the results of which are now being analysed.

The study is a project of the Collaborative Research Program: Rehabilitation & Long-Term Care, a joint initiative of Baycrest, Canadian Nurses Foundation, University of Toronto faculty of nursing and graduate department of rehabilitation science, Toronto Rehab, Bridgepoint Health, and Sunnybrook Health Centre.

Fox, the director of the program, said she began the study because she discovered that patients in complex continuing care facilities usually spend at least one day a week in bed. This situation is more of a concern because of the growing number of people in these residences and the crunch in both personnel and budgets.

The thing is, Fox said, there is little real proof that it is bad. "One lady told me that she had thought she would be less tired if she was up. It turned out that she was more tired."

Also, Fox said, some residents may find it embarassing if several people are needed to get them out of bed. This would be especially hard if they had been an independent, active person before becoming ill.

The study, she noted, is not only on the elderly bedridden; it deals with those from 32 to 96.

Other studies being carried out under the same auspices include community-based programs for stroke survivors and care partners, an abilities-focused program of morning care for people with dementia, the effect of confinement for people with cognitive impairment staying on a locked unit, and the measurement of the quality of sleep.

One of the group's notable projects has been the play I Am Still Here, a poignant production dealing with the descent into dementia and its effect on the patient, the family, staff and friends.

The idea of the whole program, explained assistant director Tammy Muskat, is to do extensive, cutting-edge research into issues surrounding rehabilitation and long-term care, and then disseminating that knowledge and experience.

"We prepare a consensus statement, and outline strategies that can be developed and coordinated in other organizations," Muskat said.

Fox added that it is important to consider that the implementation and effectiveness of any suggestion may well be different in a different context, and changes might have to be made. "The studies are not just didactic – we have ongoing dialogues," she said.

Iranian nuclear issue also a focus of discussions

recent war in Lebanon, said, "One of the most changed aspects of leading a country such as Britain today is that stability of this region also affects the stability of my country. We live in a world in which how you fare here, how Israel does with Lebanon and Palestine, are issues that also have influence on how my country fares, and that is the same right across the globe today."

But Blair, who faced Palestinian protests when he met Abbas in Ramallah on Sunday, did not publicly call on Olmert to take any concrete steps toward meeting Palestinian demands. Privately, however, diplomatic sources said Blair emphasized the need to find ways to relieve the humanitarian crisis in Gaza and find "constructive" ways to deal with the situation. The two leaders met for about an hour before the press conference, followed by dinner and another private meeting.

Asked whether he felt that Israel's unilateral approach over the last few years is now dead, Blair said the British faced a similar situation in Northern Ireland, where "you either get an agreement or you have to operate on your own." He said that while it's obviously better to reach a deal, "the only one that will stick is an agreement where people resolve their differences through politics and not through violence."

Blair said everyone agrees that a two-state solution is an agreed-upon "end point," that the "road map" is the way to get there, and that what now needs to be done is to "find a means to get back to it."

Regarding Lebanon, Blair said that United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701 is the only ceasefire that will ever be sustainable, and he said that if it's implemented "in the way it should and will be, then this will be a major strategic advance for peace in the Middle East."

The Iranian nuclear issue was also a focus of the discussions, with Blair saying that Britain remained firm that the will of the international community on this issue must be adhered to.

At times during the press conference, it seemed as if the two leaders, both politically weak and beleaguered, had formed a mutual admiration society.

Olmert, who called Britain a staunch ally of Israel, said Blair's contribution in the Mideast has been "invaluable." He praised him for "powerful" leadership, and said he valued his "support, advice and proposals."

"Tony Blair has been one of the greatest world fighters against terrorism," he said. "We hold him in the highest esteem for his determination and courage in facing terror."

Blair, for his part, praised Olmert's leadership during the recent war.

"I know from my own experience as a leader how difficult situations of conflict are," he said. Acknowledging that Israel has been through a traumatic period, he said, "I would like to pay tribute to the quite exceptional character you showed in leading your country."

On Sunday, Blair held talks with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, as well as Defence Minister Amir Peretz and Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres. He also met the families of the abducted soldiers.

According to Peres' office, Blair said he realized it would be impossible to move diplomacy with the Palestinians forward without Shalit's release.

After meeting Abbas in Ramallah, Blair flew to Beirut, where he was met by protesters accusing him of siding with Israel during its recent war with Hezbollah. At a press conference with Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, which was interrupted by protesters, Blair pledged to help strengthen Lebanese security forces as they deploy in the south of the country.

Also on Sunday, a week after Olmert shelved his plan to unilaterally withdraw from most of the West Bank, he told his cabinet the Palestinian issue is not going to disappear and that "creative ways" must be found to "kick-start" diplomacy. His comments came as the Arab League was expected to table a diplomatic plan of its own at the United Nations later this month, amid increasing calls for an international peace conference.

Olmert told cabinet that international conferences have historically been stacked against Israel and that the only international conference Israel would be willing to attend is one focused on fighting terror.

He said discussions are being held at various levels on how to empower moderates in Palestinian society so that progress can be made on the road map. This, he said, was the focus of his talks with Blair on Saturday, and would also be at the centre of talks Livni was to hold in Washington this week.

Israel Briefs

Woman named top justice

Israel appointed its first female Supreme Court president. Justice Dorit Beinisch formally took over last week from Aharon Barak and begins her new duties this week. Beinisch, 64, has served on the Supreme Court for more than a decade. Before that, she was Israel's state attorney, and distinguished herself in several high-profile battles with the security services over secrecy and human-rights issues.

Firms at Polish exhibit

Sixteen Israeli defense firms inaugurated an Israel pavilion at a defence industry exhibition in Poland. The Israeli defense delegation held a special ceremony at the 14th International Defense Industry Exhibition MSPO in Kielce, the site of Europe's largest post-World War II pogrom, where 46 Jews were murdered. Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski attended the opening of the Israeli pavilion, which featured intelligence and other systems used in Israel's war with Hezbollah.

Broader government soon?

A senior Israeli cabinet minister called for expanding the governing coalition. Interior Minister Roni Bar-On, a confidant of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said the spectre of a nuclear-armed Iran warranted bringing a broad range of political factions into the government. "I would be happy to see all the Zionist parties in the government," Bar-On said in a speech at Bar-Ilan University. "A government without a strong coalition foundation will not withstand the Iranian threat."

Sinn Fein leader shunned

Israeli officials refused to meet with Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams during his recent Mideast trip because he met with Hamas. Adams was on a two-day "private visit" to the region. Israel has refused to meet with foreign visitors who also meet with Hamas, a terror group that heads the Palestinian Authority. Adams, who met with Palestinian leaders in the West Bank was invited by PA President Mahmoud Abbas.

Aliyah reduction?

Israel's Finance Ministry is proposing substantial cuts to Ethiopian immigration next year. The cuts come as part of widespread belt-tightening after Israel's war this summer in Lebanon. The plan, announced as part of Israel's proposed 2007 budget, would halve the number of immigrants brought to Israel each month from Ethiopia, to 150 from the current rate of 300. If adopted, the change would represent a major blow to backers of Ethiopian aliyah, who launched a $100-million (US) campaign last year designed in part to pressure Israel's government to increase the rate of Ethiopian immigration. Israel's cabinet decided in March 2005 to increase Ethiopian aliyah to 600 people per month, but the decision was never implemented.

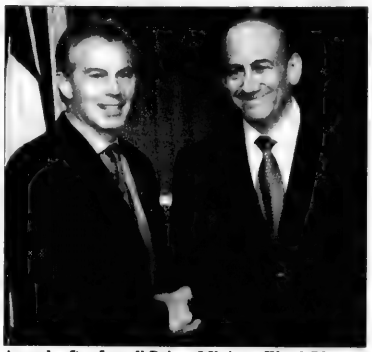
West Bank pullout off agenda

By DAN BARON
JTA



A week after Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, right, announced that disengagement from the West Bank was off the agenda, he met with British Prime Minister Tony Blair in Jerusalem. Blair came to the region to try to reinvigorate the peace process with the Palestinians.

JERUSALEM — Ehud Olmert is reconsidering his West Bank withdrawal plan.

The Israeli prime minister announced Sunday that his proposal for selective West Bank withdrawals is "not on the agenda for now," raising hope among rightists and leftists alike.

Olmert told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee: "What I thought several months ago would be the right thing to do on the Palestinian front has now changed.

"I must assess reality, not because I made a mistake, but because you must reassess priorities when they have changed," he said. "We have no intention of running away from the Palestinian issue. We cannot afford to do so. We must deal with the Palestinian issue, but consider other ways of doing so."

Cast as a stopgap measure in the absence of peace with the Palestinians, the "realignment plan" helped bring Olmert to power in May. But events have since undermined the idea.

There was the resurgence of fighting around the Gaza Strip, which Israel had quit last year in a bid to forestall violence. Cross-border rocket fire was stepped up, ignored or abetted by the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government. A soldier was abducted by Gaza gunmen, among them members of Hamas.

Then there was the bloody, monthlong war against Hezbollah, a Shiite militia that many analysts believe was bolstered by Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000. That conflict, triggered by Hezbollah's kidnapping of two soldiers on the Lebanese border, ended with an Aug. 14 ceasefire. The hostages have yet to be recovered.

"The notion of trading territory for peace was successful in two instances – Egypt and Jordan. It failed in two other cases – Lebanon and the Palestinian Authority," Israel's deputy prime minister, Shimon Peres, wrote in Britain's Guardian newspaper.

"The initiative to withdraw unilaterally from the West Bank has lost its attraction in the eyes of the Israeli public due to the after-effects of withdrawal from the Gaza Strip," Peres added. "I cannot envisage a situation today in which the majority of Israelis will support such a withdrawal."

Many on Israel's left, including even some members of the Labor party that is the junior partner in Olmert's government, long opposed unilateralism on territorial issues, fearing that it spurred the radical elements of Palestinian society. This was echoed by some on the Israeli right, many of whom also distrusted the perceived moderation of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

"It seems that Olmert has repented," said Limor Livnat of the Likud Party, which heads the political opposition.

Just what Olmert plans to do now, with his centrepiece plan shelved, remains in doubt. The most immediate option is to adopt an economic platform, especially when it comes to areas of northern Israel battered by thousands of Hezbollah rockets.

Analysts say the war cost Israel around $5.3 billion, and there are the added hefty expenses of rehabilitating the defence establishment. Israel's military and intelligence services are widely seen as having tackled Hezbollah poorly. With wars potentially looming against Syria and a nuclear-armed Iran, Israelis want to know all steps are being taken to protect them.

With his popularity sapped and Defence Minister Amir Peretz facing challenges from within his Labor party, Olmert must also deal with the prospect of his government collapsing. That means reaching out to right-wing factions that could potentially join the coalition. These factions would be encouraged by the news that the West Bank plan is on hold, but would likely demand it be scrapped altogether.

Peres proposed that Israel turn its economic plans into an alternative peacemaking platform.

"We were prepared to enter into bilateral negotiations on the basis of the 'road map,' [peace plan] but to date Hamas has prevented the Palestinian side from following through," he wrote.

"An alternative could take the form of a partnership involving Israel, Jordan and the Palestinians, following an economic route rather than a political one."

Peres proposed that the sides build on a deal already in place to turn the border region linking the Red Sea and Jordan River, via the West Bank, into a trading zone.

"This approach has worked elsewhere; most of the important changes that have occurred around the globe since the end of the Second World War have been the outcome not of military interventions but of economic advances," he wrote, adding that expanded trade zones would attract international investment and goodwill.

"If we can privatize part of the economy, why not privatize part of peace?"

In Europe, a year of co-operation despite security fears

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

European policies on Israel, Iran and the Palestinian territories played a central role in the life of European Jewry in 5766.

International issues, along with the continued growth of extremism in Europe's Islamic communities, were focal points for Jews, particularly in western Europe, where a spate of anti-Semitic attacks against individuals and synagogues left Jews worried about their safety.

"In western Europe, the violence is related to Islamic radicalism. In central and eastern Europe, it's the rise of nationalistic movements," said Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary-general of the European Jewish Congress. "There was a slight decrease in anti-Semitic violent attacks, but there was no reduction of anti-Semitism."

Perhaps the most dramatic anti-Semitic incident was the February murder in Paris of Ilan Halimi, 23, by a gang who tortured him for several weeks in a suburban apartment building. The suspects reportedly told police they targeted Halimi because "all Jews are rich" – although Halimi's family is not wealthy, the kidnappers demanded an exorbitant ransom – and they put out cigarettes on Halimi's face because, they said, "he was Jewish and we don't like Jews."

Most of the suspects are Muslims of North African or black African origin.

The number of Jews contacting the Jewish Agency for Israel's Paris office to inquire about aliyah reportedly doubled after the Halimi murder. French aliyah soared to record levels, despite a drop in the overall number of anti-Semitic incidents in France in 5766. In addition, anti-American and anti-Israel sentiment fed by the 2003 invasion of Iraq intensified when Israel and Hezbollah went to war this summer.

"We are undoubtedly in the middle of a huge and growing problem of the radical Islamicization of many European countries," said Jonathan Joseph, president of the European Council of Jewish Communities. "The effect of this is increased anti-Semitism and attacks, but I believe that hides a much greater issue. Throughout many communities, groups of radical Islamists are succeeding in de-legitimizing Jewish people among governments."

These extremist Muslim groups are thus making anti-Semitism an acceptable sentiment for those already critical of Israel.

In Great Britain, where a crisis over Muslim integration was highlighted by subway bombings carried out by Islamic extremists in July 2005, concern over security is at an all-time high. Mark Gardner, spokesperson for British Jewry's Community Security Trust, estimated that anti-Jewish incidents rose 25 per cent after the Israel-Hezbollah war began in July.

European Jewish communities are not sitting idly by in the wake of anti-Semitic activities; in fact, 5766 may have been a record year for European Jewish political activism. The European Jewish Congress is ensuring that its 41 member communities keep up the pressure on their European Union representatives to combat anti-Semitism, maintain positive attitudes toward Israel and take a tough stance on Hamas and Iran's nuclear ambitions.

The congress has had its greatest success in international issues. At its annual meeting in February, president Pierre Besnainou had the rare chance to lecture Benita Ferrero-Waldner, the European commissioner for external affairs, before a packed room of Jewish leaders.

"I just saw a woman from the Hamas election list on Israeli television saying she was proud that her son killed Jews," he said. "Should we imagine that you will have discussions with such terrorists?"

The European Union eventually found a way to keep sending massive amounts of humanitarian aid to Palestinians without engaging in talks with Hamas, which won the parliamentary elections in the Palestinian Authority in January. Cwajgenbaum sees the refusal by European politicians to harshly condemn Israel during the recent conflict with Hezbollah – in contrast to the negative attitude of much of the European public and media –as a positive sign, for which he credits Israel's August 2005 withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

"Since the disengagement in Gaza, the image of Israel has changed. We have seen, in the last couple of months, tremendous interest from Israel toward Europe and Europe toward Israel," he said.

In community development, one landmark was an April meeting in Paris of the 10 largest pan-European Jewish organizations.

Not only was it the first time such a meeting has taken place, it was also the first time the groups pledged to actively work together so that their agendas would not conflict, as they have in the past.

On the national level, there were some memorable milestones, celebrations and memorials: British Jews and politicians marked the 350th anniversary in 2006 of the readmission of Jews to Britain, following their mass expulsion several centuries earlier.

The Czech Republic and Poland held several unique commemorations, and the Czech Republic unveiled a memorial to Holocaust victims, in the city of Usti Nad Labem, in October. A six-pointed star, partly submerged in the ground, pays tribute to 1,000 victims and has been hailed as one of the most moving Jewish-themed sculptures in the country.

The Prague Jewish community, which had been immersed in political upheaval for two years, became more stable after a November election for the Jewish community council brought new leadership and saw the reappointment of Rabbi Karel Sidon as Prague's chief rabbi. Rabbi Sidon was reinstalled at the Old New Synagogue, where a Chabad rabbi had been temporarily posted by the previous community chair.

In Poland, German-born Pope Benedict XVI paid his first visit to Auschwitz-Birkenau in May to memorialize its victims. His otherwise eloquent speech about suffering there was roundly criticized because he failed to mention anti-Semitism, a fact he attempted to compensate for in subsequent addresses in Rome.

Polish President Lech Kaczynski and Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski repeatedly expressed support for Jewish causes and pledged that anti-Semitism had no place in Poland. Progress continued on the government-funded Museum of the History of Polish Jews – slated to open in 2008 – and numerous initiatives on the governmental and non-governmental level promoted Polish-Jewish relations. On the religious front, Poland welcomed four new rabbis in August in time for High Holy Day celebrations in Warsaw, Krakow and Wroclaw, including the first Polish-born rabbi since the end of communism and the first liberal rabbi since before World War II.

Germany also experienced a revolution. Most of the country's 20 Reform congregations were finally welcomed into the Central Council of Jews' state branches. The change means that Reform congregations will have greater access to the millions of dollars the government gives to support Jewish life in Germany. The move is being closely watched by other Reform groups in Europe – particularly in Spain, Italy, Austria and Hungary – where the Reform are not yet seen as legitimate religious movements by Jewish authorities.

The German government also strengthened its relationship with Israel and perhaps with Jews in general when Angela Merkel became Germany's first female chancellor in November. Merkel made a deep impression on Jews in Israel, Germany and elsewhere in the Diaspora with her commitment to the Jewish state.

In a Nov. 30 speech, her first to the Parliament as chancellor, Merkel stressed her commitment to Israel and said that Iran – whose president has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction and denied the Holocaust – must co-operate with International Atomic Energy Agency inspections of its nuclear facilities.

Anti-Semitism up in Britain: study

By VANESSA BULKACZ
JTA

LONDON — Anti-Semitism is rising in Britain, partly as a result of the situation in the Middle East, according to a new study.

The Report of the All-Party Parliamentary Inquiry Into Anti-Semitism was presented last Thursday to British Prime Minister Tony Blair. The study was chaired by Labor party lawmaker Denis MacShane and co-written by a multiparty group of 14 parlimentarians over 10 months.

MacShane said many British Jews bear the brunt of people's anger over Israeli and American policies.

British Jews welcomed the report.

"This is an important document and its recommendations demand careful study. The report bears out many of the concerns that the board has expressed for the past five years," said Henry Grunwald, president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews. "We look forward to working with the government and other interested parties in implementing the report's recommendations in the days ahead."

The report makes more than 30 recommendations, including calling on the British government to provide greater support for British Jews' security needs, especially with reference to places of worship and schools. It also calls for a concrete definition of anti-Semitism.

"Anti-Semitism is not one-dimensional. It is perpetrated in different ways by different groups within society, and for this reason it is hard to identify," the report said.

It describes the policing situation as "inexcusable," saying police forces aren't required to record anti-Semitic incidents as they are other hate crimes.

One of the panel members, former Conservative leader Iain Duncan Smith, said the situation is worse than he had realized.

The inquiry indicates that fewer than one in 10 anti-Semitic attacks reported to authorities resulted in prosecutions, and called for the Crown Prosecution Service to investigate why the number reported is so low.

The study suggests that tensions in the Middle East have exacerbated the problem. The report points to a minority of Islamic extremists who have used the situation in the Middle East to stoke hatred against Jews.

Torontonian helps Libyan Jewish community in postwar Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — When prominent Toronto Jewish community member Walter Arbib learned of the damages to Israel's northern communities during the Israeli/Hezbollah war, he jumped to help.

"I was mostly concerned about the children in the Libyan settlements of Moshav Dalton and Moshav Alma, which are right on the Lebanese border," says Arbib, a Jew of Libyan descent, and CEO of the Skylink Group.

"I wanted to do whatever I could to help. I think it's important for all Jews around the world to help Israel, not just during its times of need, but always. Even if you have to stretch yourself to help, it's something you simply have to do."

Israeli Jews of Libyan ancestry number around 100,000 in Israel. According to Arbib, the Libyan Jewish community in Toronto is very small, totalling only around 25 people.

This is one reason, he says, that his ties to the larger Israeli community are so strong. "We have to stick together," says Arbib, who has long been involved in Jewish Libyan causes through the World Organization of Libyan Jews.

With help from the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the UJA in Israel, Arbib was able to aid Israel's Libyan communities."

In a matter of weeks, he managed to get bomb-shelter kindergarten facilities on two moshavim – which each service an estimated 120 kids – painted and furnished, and set up with air conditioning, televisions, games and toys.

"I am amazed at how much faster private initiatives can move," says Arbib.

Arbib also donated a van to the communities to help them with transporting children to and from the kindergartens; subsidized a trip for 65 children from the communities to spend two weeks touring around Israel's central and southern regions, to give them a break from the chaos at home; bought school uniforms and supplies for 100 Ethiopian children in a neighbouring community in preparation for the new school year; and distributed 300 iPods to soldiers who were stationed in Lebanon.

It was these soldiers who honoured Arbib on Sept. 7, at the Center for the Heritage of Libyan Jews in Or Yehuda, a suburb of Tel Aviv. There, with Likud Knesset member Silvan Shalom and the commanding officer of the Southern District of the Israeli Police, Uri Bar-Lev, attending, the soldiers presented Arbib with a plaque to thank him for his support during the war.

"It was a very emotional, gratitude-filled event," says president of the World Jewish Congress, Moshe Ronen. Ronen attended the ceremony along with Torontonians Norman Godfrey, of the Yorkwood Building Group, and Emile Aufgang, of Aufgang Travel.

"These soldiers really went out of their way," says Arbib, who notes that their choice of venue for the ceremony was thoughtful, given his strong connections to the museum. Arbib recently donated some 100,000 shekels (about $23,000) to refurbish a wing of the museum and to create a special exhibition there about Libyan Jewry.

"It was a beautiful ceremony. It was very touching," he says.

Afterward, Arbib and his entourage headed to the two moshavim in the north. "It was surprising and terrible to see the damages to the northern part of Israel," he says. They saw many buildings reduced to rubble and many fallen trees.

Under the circumstances, meeting the children at the moshavim was particularly inspiring for Arbib. "To see the kids singing and dancing really gave me a good feeling," he says. "I got to actually see with my own eyes that I really did help, and that felt very good."

That part of the day was also the most touching for Godfrey. "It was amazing to see all these kids wearing T-shirts that read 'All our hearts' and singing in chorus," says Godfrey. "I really got the sense that the whole community was so appreciative and thankful."

Says Godfrey, "This was a case where you could see how one person can affect the lives of hundreds of people."

As we approach the High Holidays, it's a time for festivity and solemnity.

It is an opportunity to gather with families and ask ourselves about successes and wrong-doings, about our actions and inactions, and the aspirations we had and those we forgot about because of difficulties.

Rosh Hoshanah and Yom Kippur are days of reflection, prayer and repentance for our entire people. Let's not forget the trying circumstances, the difficult times and the loss of life in Israel. Our support for Israel will always be strong and everlasting.

May the Almighty bring us a wonderful year - a year of full challenges to constantly grow. May this year be one of health, dialogue, harmony and peace. We should be inscribed in the book of life, peace and blessings.

May our prayers - and the prayers of all peoples - for peace and for life, be answered.

From my family to yours, and to the hundreds of people who support the development of young Jewish athletes throughout Canada, I would like to extend our sincere best wishes for a Happy and Healthy New Year.

Shana Tovah!

Once A Nazi: It's been almost 10 years since Concordia professor Adalbert Lallier revealed that he had been a member of the Waffen SS and had witnessed the wanton murder of seven Jewish inmates at Theresienstadt.

Lallier kept mum about the incident for 52 years until New York private investigator Steven Rambam came to Montreal and spoke to him in 1997. Lallier's story is the subject of Once a Nazi, a new documentary by Montreal filmmakers Frederic Bohbot and Evan Beloff. The première screening takes places Sept. 19 at Concordia University.

After Lallier's surprise admission, Germany convicted his commanding officer, Julius Viel, for the murders; it was Germany's last war crimes trial. The elderly Viel died six months into his 12-year sentence.

Beloff previously produced the zany and comical documentary Shmelvis, which focused on a pilgrimage by a group of Jewish lads to Graceland and their search for Elvis Presley's Jewish roots. Shmelvis was a hit entry in the Toronto Jewish Film Festival some years ago and received a thoughtful review in the Forward.

Prewar journalism depicts Jewish life in Poland

By HINDI DIAMOND
Special to The CJN

A chance meeting at Village Shalom, a retirement community in Kansas, of Bob Becker, a volunteer teacher, and Yadviga Finkelstein, a 93-year-old student, sparked a monumental project.

Finkelstein asked Becker if he could find volunteers to translate a Yiddish book compiled by her late husband, Chaim Finkelstein, of articles from a newspaper he edited in Warsaw from 1908 to '39, just before Hitler came into power. Called HAYNT – A Tsaytung Bay Yidn, the book chronicles the history of the newspaper and also gives a picture of Jewish life in Poland during this period.

> 'I feel it's a mitzvah to make this historical document available to the non-Yiddish-speaking world as well as to Jewish readers'

Becker, who corralled 29 volunteer translators on the Internet in December 2004, from all over, including Poland, France, the Netherlands and Australia, said the task was a "labour of love." Now, CDs of the book, in English and Yiddish, are available.

"I feel it's a mitzvah to make this historical document available to the non-Yiddish-speaking world as well as to Jewish readers," Becker said.

"I never would have known that Poland was moving towards its own mini Holocaust, except for this project. Like most people, I thought it was just Germany. We need to make people aware of this."

Chaim Finkelstein's daughter, Aviva Blumberg, a psychiatrist in New York City, said, "Unfortunately, I am ignorant of Yiddish, although this ignorance is in part what saved my life during the war. My flawless Polish enabled me to 'pass,' and ultimately join my father in America in 1945. However, now I am delighted to have the opportunity to read his book in English."

Ruth Fisher Goodman, of Wilmington, Del., is one of the book's translators. "I thought that the HAYNT translation was an important work, and that is why I agreed to do it. Polish Jewry had a rich history," she said.

"Last May, my husband and I visited Poland and were dismayed that there is still virulent anti-Semitism there. There is virtually no trace of Jewish life in Warsaw and Krakow, the two cities we visited. In fact, I went to the shtetl that my mother grew up in and the local priest and mayor denied that Jews ever lived there.

Goodman stressed that "the world needs to know what a splendid people Polish Jewry was, and that can only be learned by reading the translations in this book of a vanished society."

Finkelstein said it was her husband's dying wish to see his book translated into English, "so that it would have a wider readership.

"At last I have seen Chaim's life's goal fulfilled."

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Photo artist May Karp's latest project started on a damp and dreary day in Toronto.

"I yearned for colour and sunshine. And then, off in the distance, a ray of sunshine peeked through," she says.

She recalls being "awestruck" by the effect. As the city brightened, she began taking photographs. "I rushed to do as much as I could lest it disappear. Each image became separate and distinctive," she says.

Karp compares these works, grouped under the title "Urban Reflections – New York & Toronto" and showing at the Moore Gallery until the end of September, to bizarre dream imagery. "I was inspired by the work of architects Wright, Gaudi, Gehry, by artists Dali, Picasso, Mondrian and Riopelle.

"The more easily discernable architectural portions in my images offer fractured glimpses as elements of fantasy."

Karp captures some hot colours. In the works, there is a compositional playfulness of jigsaw-puzzle-like reflections creating glimpses of nature's wizardry. "I share with you nature's wizardry dances of light, unpredictable and ever changing," she says.

Karp notes her exhibit features works that are different than those in her previous shows. "This is a continuing evolution in my ongoing photographic adventure."

She says her feelings of happiness "are hugely affected by the sun or lack of it, and by colour around me."

Karp is the only photo artist among a group of painters who show at the Moore Gallery, among them Riopelle, Harold Town and David Bolduc.

She has donated works to the Toronto General Hospital, Baycrest, Mount Sinai Hospital and the Princess Margaret Hospital.

"Urban Reflections – New York & Toronto" is her fourth one-woman show at the Moore Gallery, and she has exhibited at Aventura in Florida. Her photographs can be found in corporate and private collections throughout North America and Europe.

For more information, phone 416-504-3914 or e-mail the gallery at mooregallery@bellnet.ca.

Polish filmmaker's Samson set in the Holocaust era

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

Several Polish films have been released on DVD recently by Morningstar Entertainment.

In the past we have looked at two of these releases – Austeria and Border Street.

Now a third film, Samson, has been released.

This is a 1961 black and white film directed by Academy Award and Cannes Film Festival-winner Andrzej Wajda. Wajda is considered by most film experts as Poland's finest director and a filmmaker who has always succeeded in provoking controversy.

Samson is a psychological study of a young Jewish student, Jakub Gold, who accidentally kills a schoolmate in a brawl at the polytechnical university. Gold is imprisoned and not released until the onset of World War II.

Once the Germans occupy Warsaw, Gold is sent to the Warsaw Ghetto, where he is assigned to pick up corpses and help bury the dead. He manages to escape from the ghetto, only to find himself trapped in the world of non-Jews, where discovery and arrest by the Nazis is an ever-present threat.

While hiding out on the Aryan side, Gold wishes to return to the ghetto to share in the fate of his kinsmen. He also wishes he had the strength of the biblical Samson so he could fight the Germans single-handedly.

Gold eventually does return to the ghetto, but only after the Jewish revolt has been put down and the ghetto has been destroyed.

This is a marvellous film that provides a lot of food for thought and is a brilliant example of Wajda's work.

The film is in Polish with optional English subtitles and is presented in anamorphic widescreen.

Another "Jewish" film that is now available in video stores everywhere is Free Zone, the latest film by Israeli director Amos Gitai.

Ordinarily, I would seek out any opportunity to see Natalie Portman on the screen. Not in this case. This must be one of the worst films I have seen in a long time. It is badly written, confusing and eventually, pointless. This is one film to avoid.

Cult film Gloomy Sunday on DVD

It's here! That fan favourite, Gloomy Sunday, has finally been released on DVD!

Gloomy Sunday has had an incredible history for a film that never received wide release. It played in one theatre in Boston for 70 weeks, and there is a theatre in New Zealand that has played this film once a week for a number of years, and still sells out each screening.

In Toronto, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival has screened the film five times and still receives requests to show it again.

So why has this film become so popular?

The story is a little soap opera-ish, but tells a wonderful story in an appealing way. The film is about Laszlo, a young Jewish man, and his non-Jewish girlfriend, Ilona. They decide to open an elegant restaurant in prewar Budapest. And as everyone knows, a classy establishment has to have a pianist to provide mood music. Eventually, the couple hires Andras, the perfect musician, and the restaurant becomes very popular.

The restaurant's popularity may have been helped by the presence of the beautiful Ilona. This young woman has a magic of her own. Every man she meets seems to fall in love with her. She needs to do nothing to encourage this; she possesses a sexual attractiveness that very few women have.

Andras is not immune to Ilona's charms and soon begins an affair with the woman, although Laszlo does not seem to mind too much. Then, a German businessman visiting Budapest begins to patronize the restaurant and he, too, falls in love with Ilona, although she rejects his advances.

Andras, inspired by his love for Ilona, composes a beautiful melody, which Laszlo arranges to have recorded. The song becomes a huge hit throughout Europe, but seems to inspire people listening to it to commit suicide.

When World War II erupts and Budapest is occupied by the Nazis, one of the top SS officers is that same German businessman, Hans, who is still in love with the lovely Ilona.

All of this sounds a little too Hollywoodish? Well, it is based on a true story. There was a song called Gloomy Sunday that caused people to commit suicide and some parts of the rest of the story are based on true events.

I won't give away the interesting ending, but if you haven't seen this film, it is certainly a must. It deals with many issues that deserve pondering and will certainly stimulate discussion. and if you have seen it, it is certainly worth another viewing. It is entertaining and thought provoking and everyone seems to have a different interpretation of how the film ends. — L.A.

Sweet Mud set on an 'ideologically rigid' kibbutz

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sweet Mud is one of those blessed films where key elements fuse in a magical mixture.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last week, Dror Shaul's feature-length Hebrew-language movie is set on a scruffy-looking kibbutz in southern Israel in 1974.

There, amid the pastoral backdrop of parched hills and rolling pastures, a drama of poignant proportions unfolds.

The chief protagonists are Miri (Ronit Yudkevitch), a fortysomething widow, and her precocious 12-year-old son, Dvir (Tomer Steinhof).

Miri, to put it charitably, is eccentric. When two European volunteers arrive to work on the kibbutz, she greets them in only her underwear and bra.

Miri has recently returned from a mental institution to live with Dvir, who is fast approaching his bar mitzvah age, and her older son, Eyal (Pini Tabger), who has a roving eye for nubile women.

The nature of Miri's illness remains undefined, but what is certain is that she is is most definitely not a paragon of psychological stability.

When she learns that a long-distance gentile lover plans to visit her, Miri is simply overjoyed. Stephan (Henri Garcin), the virile man in question, is a judo champion from Switzerland. She met him on the beach in Netanya.

Shaul, a master of suspense, captures Miri's anticipation of Stephan's imminent arrival with consummate skill. We ask ourselves: What kind of a person will he possibly be?

Stephan, it turns out, is considerably older than the athletic image projected of him in a heroic poster attached to Miri's wall. Nevertheless, as a subsequent scene reveals, Stephan is still strong and physically adept. He is also kind and generous, and, most importantly, Miri's kindred spirit.

Although the kibbutzniks in the communal dining room greet him rather coldly, Stephan likes the kibbutz, and is ready to settle down there with Miri and her sons. But this is not to be. Miri's bliss is irretrievably shattered when, after a violent incident, Stephan is asked to leave the kibbutz.

As she sinks into despair, Dvir, a sensitive and intuitive boy, is poised to pick up the pieces of his mother's broken life. Eyal cannot be of assistance, having been inducted into the army.

Miri's fellow kibbutzniks are empathetic to a point, but in the end they treat her like an outcast.

As Shaul portrays them, the kibbutzniks are less than appealing.

Miri's mother and father-in-law, presumably still grieving over the untimely death of their son, are aloof. The sanctimonious kibbutz secretary uses his position to elicit sexual favours, and the cowhand, an unpleasant person, has peculiar sex habits. Eyal, who always seems to be horny, is not above stealing popsicles.

The kibbutz itself is depicted as an insular, small-minded, petty and ideologically rigid place that thrives on outmoded traditions and rituals.

Tomer Steinhof and Ronit Yudkevitch have the lead roles in Sweet Mud.

Shaul is a skilful director, and in his hands, the film is a pleasure to watch.

The script, written by Shaul himself, is compelling. He focuses his attention on Miri and Dvir, but a coming-of-age subplot involving Dvir and a girl named Maya (Danielle Kitzis), a foreign exchange student, is also of interest.

Shaul coaxes first-rate performances from the cast.

With effortless ease, Yudkevitch plays the role of a vulnerable woman caught between dementia and euphoria.

Steinhof is extraordinary, showing sensitivity and resolution as he valiantly tries to cope with Miri's declining mental health.

Garcin displays old-world gallantry and strength of character.

The cinematography is evocative and distills the essence of a hard-scrabble land, and the musical score, at once lush and longing, fits the mood perfectly.

Soaring yet heart-breaking, Sweet Mud is one of the finest Israeli films in years, a stellar tribute to Israeli cinema.

Ex-Mossad director Ephraim Halevy writes his memoirs

Man in the Shadows* by Ephraim Halevy, St. Martin's Press.

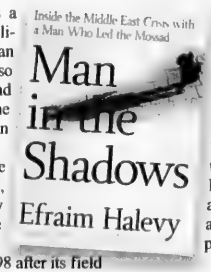
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ephraim Halevy was an important figure in the Israeli government for many years. As a member of the Mossad – the foreign intelligence agency – from 1961 onward, he served as an analyst, case officer and deputy division chief. He also held overseas postings in Washington and Paris and was an adviser to five prime ministers from Yitzhak Rabin to Ariel Sharon.

Ephraim Halevy



The deputy director of the Mossad from 1990 to 1995, Halevy was subsequently Israel's ambassador to the European Union. Named director of the Mossad in 1998 after its field agents in Jordan bungled the assassination of Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, Halevy retired in 2002, and now heads the Centre for Strategic and Policy Studies at the Hebrew University.

In his newly published memoir, Man in the Shadows, Halevy emerges from his accustomed anonymity to expound on his career as an intelligence officer. As might be expected, he does not exactly spill his guts, but his revelations are quite interesting, and presented in a lucid formal style.

On the policy level, Halevy discusses seminal developments from the 1993 peace process to the war on global terrorism. Delving into personalities, he draws pen portraits of such players as former Palestinian president Yasser Arafat, former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, now Likud leader, and former prime minister Shimon Peres, now deputy prime minister. Some of these sketches are hardly flattering.

"During all my years in the Mossad, I have seen the Middle East crisis from the inside," he writes in a generic vein. "There have been times when certain events totally took me by surprise… There have been occasions when I knew what was about to happen… It has also been my great privilege to participate in a few instances that made history…"

Early on in this generally engrossing book, he admits that the Sept. 11, 2001 Arab terrorist attacks in the United States left him "almost totally helpless" since the precise nature and scope of the threat were initially impossible to evaluate. But he rates Al Qaeda's actions as "the declaration of World War III" and acknowledges that the war against Islamic radicalism may last a generation or more.

In his judgment, Al Qaeda's agenda is to Islamicize the world. He advises readers to take its pronouncements at face value and warns that "the battle is [primarily] an internal struggle within Islam."

Israel's strategic relationship with Jordan occupies front and centre stage in Halevy's narrative because he was Rabin's personal emissary to King Hussein.

After one of his periodic talks with the Jordanian monarch in Amman, he returned to Israel with the conviction that they had worked out the parameters of a historic peace agreement. But the following day, Hamas suicide bombers wreaked havoc in Afula and Hadera, and due to the fact that Hamas had its headquarters in Amman, public opinion in Israel turned against Jordan.

Rabin wanted to take "a very tough stand" against Jordan, but Halevy talked him out of it and a major crisis was thus averted. As he puts it, "We could have easily gone to war with Jordan on false premises had my visit not taken place just at that point…"

Several months later, in Israel's ongoing negotiations with Jordan, Halevy was called upon to resolve yet another problem when a senior Israeli official objected to a problematic word in the draft treaty and would not be moved.

Writing that a maze of border, water, defence and security issues could have scuttled Israel's rapprochement with Jordan, he cites two telling examples. King Hussein demanded the return of some 380 square kilometres of territory – more than the area of the entire Gaza Strip – south of the Dead Sea, and was not keen on letting Israeli farmers in the Arava continue using wells Israel had unilaterally bored in Jordan. These obstacles, as well as others, were eventually overcome, and a peace treaty was signed in 1994.

In recognition of Halevy's contributions, Rabin asked him to be Israel's first ambassador to Jordan. But Peres, then foreign minister, objected, and Rabin offered Halevy the European Union ambassadorship.

Still smarting from this incident, Halevy uses his book to take potshots at Peres. He accuses him of forever seeking popular acclaim and throwing "caution and good counsel to the winds." He claims that Peres excluded professional diplomats from active participation in substantive discussions and hatched "secret channels" that rendered his negotiations "largely pointless and ultimately useless." In addition, he notes, Peres apparently showed contempt for and little interest in the Mossad.

Halevy was not privy to the clandestine talks that produced the Oslo accords, but he makes it clear that "the provisions of the agreement were so imprecise" that they could be likened to "a piece of Swiss cheese." In an implicit critique of Peres, Halevy says that he adopted a go-it-alone attitude during the Oslo talks and did not invite "professional input in advance of policy decisions."

As far as he is concerned, Peres and his subordinates engaged in "dreams of peace" and were loath "to confront the true facts of life and grapple with them." He adds, "This was a catastrophic way of decision making."

Arafat also comes in for sharp criticism. Prior to Oslo, Halevy claims, Arafat shunned every attempt to resolve the plight of Palestinian refugees and blocked almost every attempt to establish dialogue with Israel. But Halevy fails to mention that, under Israeli law, dealings with the Palestine Liberation Organization were illegal.

Halevy suggests that an accommodation with the Palestinians is not feasible in the foreseeable future because they insist on a full Israeli withdrawal to the 1949 armistice lines, demand the partition of Jerusalem and seek, in some form or other, the right of the return of the Palestinians.

As for Israel's acceptance of the 2003 "road map" peace plan, he dismisses it as a "grievous error."

He faults moderate governments in Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Tunisia and Qatar for not having changed the climate of "rabid incitement" and "all-out hatred of Israel" that exists in the Arab world.

"The net result of all this has been that whereas at the… top levels of government in the Arab world there has been a steadily growing acceptance of Israel as a reality, these very same regimes have nurtured and in some cases even encouraged popular activities that have run contrary to their so-called … policies and interests."

Halevy's appraisal of Israeli prime ministers he has worked with seems reasonable. Yitzhak Shamir had little trust in his Arab interlocutors, while Rabin was obsessed by details. Netanyahu was gifted in public relations but relied on "instant solution[s]" to problems. Ehud Barak possessed a brilliant mind but was suspicious of everyone surrounding him.

Toward the close of Man in the Shadows, Halevy reveals that he was essentially pushed out as director of the Mossad. "My approach was not approved by the prime minister [Ariel Sharon]… Many of my meetings were now being leaked to the press. My initiatives were similarly being paraded and derided publicly…"

As Halevy archly suggests, the rough and tumble of Israeli politics is not for the faint of heart.

Ram, Erlich bow out at U.S. Open

By ALLON SINAI
Jerusalem Post

FLUSHING MEADOWS, New York — Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich lost 7-6, 6-7, 6-2 to Arnaud Clement and Michael Llodra of France in the third round of the U.S. Open last week.

The seventh-seeded pair had to settle for $25,000 (US) and the knowledge that they have edged closer to booking their spot in the year-ending Masters Tournament.

The Masters features the top eight doubles pairing in the world. Ram and Erlich will need to maintain their current ranking for the next three months to appear in the tournament in China.

The Israelis had their serve broken at the start of the first set. They broke back almost immediately and tied the score at 4-4. Ram and Erlich dominated the tiebreaker to win it 7-2 and took the set 7-6.

Both teams held on to their serves in the second set and once more the winner had to be decided on a tie-breaker. The Israelis saved two set points in the breaker, but the Frenchmen wrapped up the set.

Clement and Llodra raced ahead at the start of the third set and broke Ram and Erlich twice to take a 4-0 lead. The Israelis won their next two games on serve.

However, it was too little, too late, and the Frenchmen closed out the set 6-2 and advanced to the fourth round.

In other U.S. Open action, 21st-ranked Shahar Pe'er was completely outclassed by world No. 2 Justine Henin-Hardenne in fourth-round women's singles play. Pe'er only won one game in the two sets of the match, losing in 50 minutes, 6-1, 6-0, to the Belgian.

Shahar Pe'er outclassed by world No. 2 player

Despite being soundly defeated in her final singles match, the 19-year-old Israeli will look back fondly on the last week in Flushing Meadows. Pe'er reached the last 16 of the U.S. Open for the first time in her career and will likely climb in the WTA Tour rankings to become one of the world's top 20 female tennis players.

Henin-Hardenne, who was attempting to reach her fourth straight Grand Slam final, was nearly flawless, hitting 21 winners and committing only six unforced errors.

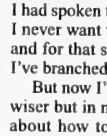
"It was a very good match for me," Henin-Hardenne said. "I did a lot of serve and volleying today and that helped me to stay aggressive." Pe'er, on the other hand, had only five winners and a massive 20 unforced errors in the two sets.

Pe'er was also in action in the women's doubles, losing with partner Marion Bartoli to the Japanese pair of Shinobu Asagoe and Akiko Morigami 6-4, 6-7(6), 6-4.

The 14th seeded Israeli-French duo served twice for the match in the second set and also had three set points in the tie-break. However, the pair squandered all their chances and eventually lost the match in three sets.

Toronto Maccabi youth athletes win 12 medals: Toronto sent 58 athletes to last month's JCC Maccabi Games in Stamford, Conn. Competing in boys and girls soccer, boys and girls basketball, and boys and girls baseball and swimming, the Toronto contingent earned 12 medals in all. The under-16 soccer teams each finished second, good for silver medals; the boys and girls baseball teams each won bronze medals; and in the pool, Toronto swimmers captured six silver to go with two bronze medals.

Now it's up to me



It's been about nine months since I first moved out on my own, and during that time, I've thought a lot about what makes a house a Jewish home.

I've done what I can, putting up mezuzahs, displaying special Shabbat candle holders and hanging up a beautiful Jewish blessing that my friend bought for me, but, despite my efforts, my apartment still lacks that special feeling Jewish homes always seem to emit the minute you walk in.

At first I thought it was the lack of good Jewish food in my fridge. (I've just about perfected my french fry- and hamburger-making skills, but I don't think I'm ready to try cooking anything new.) Then I thought it was the lack of yelling from Jewish mothers or the sounds of kids running around.

But then I realized that it takes more than decorations to make a house feel Jewish. It takes a lifestyle.

Growing up in Thornhill, it was impossible not to feel Jewish. Even my friends who weren't Jewish called themselves honorary Jews because of the strong and spirited community that we all lived in.

Kosher restaurants, kosher grocery stores, and an abundance of synagogues and outreach programs were scattered throughout the neighbourhood. I never realized what I had until I moved downtown and discovered grocery shopping.

I have yet to find a place south of Bloor Street that sells kosher meat, which means that every time I have to stock the fridge, I need to schlep all the way up to St. Clair Avenue. But even there, the selection isn't that great, so most of the time, I head back to my little Israel north of Steeles Avenue.

There's something to be said about living in a place as multicultural as downtown Toronto. Race and religion seem non-existent, and it functions like a peaceful melting pot instead of a jagged mosaic.

Walking downtown always reminds me of my first day in public school in Grade 4. Up until then, I had attended a Hebrew day school. I'll never forget the culture shock I felt when I sat down for my first class. The kids seemed like they were from another planet, and they appeared years older than me in maturity. I remember sitting shyly next to one boy, and when he spoke to me, all I could think was that it was the first time I had spoken to someone who was black. I never want to feel that ignorant again, and for that simple fact, I'm happy that I've branched out of my comfort zone.

But now I'm in a different place, a lot wiser but in many ways just as ignorant about how to keep Judaism alive in a neighbourhood that doesn't really support one culture more than any other.

There's a synagogue not too far from my house and a Jewish community centre on Bloor Street, but I have yet to reach out to either of them, and maybe that's part of the problem.

Growing up in a strongly Jewish area, I was always fortunate enough to have Judaism come to me. If I drove to the mall on Shabbat, the mere presence of Orthodox Jews walking on the sidewalk reminded me that it was a holy day. Now, If I walk to the shops along Queen Street on Saturday, there's no one and nothing there to remind me of that holiness.

My Jewish upbringing is no longer the responsibility of my family and community, and my understanding of the faith is no longer the job of my Hebrew school teachers.

Judaism is now completely up to me, and my home has become the ultimate test.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My 18-year-old daughter Ashley has no respect for money. It literally burns a hole in her pocket. She works from time to time, but only in stores where she loves the merchandise so that she can take advantage of the discount given to employees. She often ends up spending more than she makes, and before I know it, she quits and is on to bigger and better stores.

Ashley is a good kid and has a nice group of friends. She is bright, attractive and a real go-getter. She could use these traits for getting a head start in life, but instead she is totally caught up with clothes, boys and partying. She uses my car all the time and often leaves the gas tank empty. I try to talk to her about school and the future, but she is so far away from caring that I don't even know where to start. Any ideas?

On the Wrong Track

Dear On the Wrong Track

Ashley seems like a teenage girl who knows what she wants and goes after it. That is a good trait to have. She has all the ingredients of a high achiever. You just have to channel that energy so she learns to use it to her best advantage.

Ashley needs to have regular responsibilities at home – things such as keeping her room clean and keeping the bathroom and kitchen tidy. It doesn't really matter what the responsibilities are, as long as they are things she can be accountable for. If she fails to perform her tasks, there must be appropriate consequences.

At 18, she can start learning how to budget. If Ashley is working, she should be contributing some of her paycheque to the household. She can spend the remainder of her paycheque on clothes. Another area that needs addressing is the car. If she's going to use it, she must help pay for gas, insurance and maintenance. Once again, she will be forced to budget.

Life is not all about immediate gratification. Ashley needs to understand that not everything is hers to have on a whim. If she wants something, she needs to set goals and work toward them. It will teach her to appreciate things that much more when she does get them.

I wish all my readers a healthy and happy New Year.

A High Holy Day questionnaire

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Floor seats for the Toronto Raptors will cost you at least $500 a pop. High Holy Day tickets might cost you a similar amount. Which is the better value?

Last year, following Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, I conducted an informal poll among family members, friends, colleagues, etc., to find out how meaningful their holiday and shul experiences were.

The responses varied, generally based on the size and denomination of the synagogue the person attended, as well as their age. Overall, many were satisfied with the spirit and results of their yamim tovim, but an equal number felt otherwise.

Among those who felt positively, I heard such comments as, "I had prepared a month in advance for these special days and was ready to pray and commit fully to what Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur had to offer me when they arrived."

Of those who were dissatisfied, statements ranged from "I was bored with the services and had little idea what was going on" to "It's strange to walk into shul, unprepared for the intensity of the High Holy Days and expect that I can connect with the prayers and objectives of the day."

To those who were happy with their High Holy Day experiences, great! Share your insight as to why with others. To those who are less than satisfied, consider taking some time in Elul (the Hebrew month preceding the Days of Awe) to find a quiet place, gather your thoughts and take stock of your year and what you want to accomplish in 5767.

As well, think back to last year's High Holy Day experiences. Recall how you bought shul tickets and a dapper suit or outfit, and invested the time to go to shul with your loved ones and sit through hours of prayer – equivalent to the time it takes to fly to Australia.

Then ask yourself some very important questions, ones that could seriously affect this year's experience. Attribute points to your answers, with 1 being the lowest score, or "I got nothing out of my experience," and 10 being "I couldn't have asked for more."

- Did I get very much out of shul last year on the High Holy Days?
- Without familial pressure, would I go again?
- Did the services meet my expectations?
- Do I have a general idea as to what the holidays are all about, and do I understand what's going on during prayer services?
- How much did I contribute to the services?

If you scored between 40 and 50, you are preparing for, and participating in, the High Holy Days well and are likely attending the right shul. If your score is 25 to 40, you're making a decent effort, but falling a little short of your expectations. Consider whether you're doing enough reading and thinking prior to the yamim tovim. If you scored under 25, you might want to analyze your relationship to the holidays and truthfully assess whether you're attending the right synagogue and whether a change in how you participate in yom tov may be in order.

High Holy Day services can be a significant time for personal and collective growth. You invest a lot of resources in these days. If they are tedious, dry or mostly meaningless, and if they've been that way for years, adjust your objectives. You may want to find a new shul (perhaps a smaller more intimate one), or you might want to speak to your rabbi about including more English translation or allowing time during services for personal meditation and introspection.

But the biggest question is: where would you rather be at the end of this month – at a Raptors game or sitting on the shul bench with your family? You might as well be honest. Wouldn't you do the same with any other investment?

May there be peace in Israel and the world.

Calm amid the storm of war

Editorial

The calm in the photo of the young soldier saying his morning prayers belies the storm that raged in southern Lebanon for some 34 days this past summer.

We can only guess at the prayer on his lips. It is not the Shema Yisrael, the millennial watchword of Jewish faith, for his fingers are not entwined in the fringes of his tallit. Nor is it the Amidah, the central, thrice-repeated, daily prayer of 18 benedictions, for he is not standing.

But there can be no doubt that at some point in his silent whispers and earnest devotions, he prays for peace: peace for the Land, his people, his comrades, himself.

Devotion to God is, of course, the source of the soldier's devotion to his people, in whose defence he risked his young life.

Indeed, many young soldiers risked their lives last summer. Alas, many young soldiers fell.

They fell fighting an odious and cruel enemy whose publicly, even proudly, proclaimed purpose was to kill the Jews of Israel.

They fell defending their families, friends and countrymen.

They fell defending the simple yet elegant notion that human beings have the right to live in peace, free from attack, free from the fear of annihilation.

They fell defending the belief that all life is precious.

To the enemies of Israel, this must seem a radical concept, completely and overtly at odds with the ghoulish cult of death and martyrdom that forms the central chapter of the Hamas and Hezbollah handbook on how and why to fight the infidel Jews and their western allies.

It was a difficult summer.

So many families suffered unutterable sorrow. So much destruction scorched the earth.

Yet, once again, as we witnessed most recently at the height of the terror war launched against Israel in September 2000, the more savage the physical onslaught against Israel, the more savage, too, the Complexities of contemporary Israel

"Surprised? Of course I was surprised," says Israeli writer Etgar Keret in his short story Fatso. Keret, who's in his mid-30's, has been dubbed a new generation's Amos Oz. He specializes in telling Kafka-like tales in which the line between reality and fantasy is stretched thin.

Ed Morgan, National President, Canadian Jewish Congress

But, of course, in 21st-century Israel one doesn't have to look for drama. One of Keret's stories, Surprise Egg, relates how victims of suicide bombings are always taken to Tel Aviv's Forensic Institute for an autopsy, as if they were a Fabergé egg inside of which waited a gem or surprise. The seemingly pointless exercise bears fruit, if it can be put that way, in the case of a woman victim who is found to have been riddled not only with the shards and shrapnel of the terrorist's bomb but also by previously undiagnosed tumours. Had she not been on the bus at the unfortunate time of the blast, she would have been dead in a week from cancer.

The question for the pathologist is whether or not to tell the dead woman's husband about his find. On one hand, it might relieve the husband from tormenting himself with fateful questions such as "if only she hadn't gone to work that day," or "if only I'd driven her." On the other hand, the news might make her tragic death even more horrible: "a death experienced twice over," says Keret, "as if someone up there wanted to make absolutely sure... What is cancer, [the pathologist] thought to himself, if not a terrorist attack from above?"

In the end, the difference both does and doesn't matter. "The woman's dead, her husband's a widower, her children are orphans, that's what matters, that's what's sad, and all the rest is nonsense," the pathologist tells himself. But then, the story closes with the loving husband sitting in his empty kitchen, contemplating the enormity of his loss. "If only she hadn't gone to work that day," he thinks, ironically repeating the very thought he was supposed to avoid by not knowing the truth. "If only I'd driven her. She'd still be alive now, sitting here in the kitchen with me."

Both observations ring true. Man's intervention brought death to the wife and grief to the husband; God's put sadness in abeyance, bringing a moment of love to them both.

Which brings us back to the initial surprise in Keret's Fatso story. A young man has begun to fall in love with a girl he has been dating, although strangely she is only available for lunches and afternoon matinées. He is shocked when she eventually reveals that she transforms every night into "a heavy, hairy man, with no neck, with a gold ring on his pinky."

Time, however, heals all wounds. The narrator ends up enjoying the company of both, making passionate love with the woman in the afternoon and carousing in bars, shouting at girls, and watching soccer on television all night with the man.

Are we surprised at the complexities of contemporary Israel? Can the same country one month leave tenderly cultivated greenhouses intact for its adversaries in Gaza to thrive, and the next destroy infrastructure and entire neighbourhoods so that its adversaries in Lebanon do not? Israel is a land of peaceful science and military industry, an exporter of tulips and of tanks, a place of spiritual renewal and of state power. This Rosh Hashanah, like every Rosh Hashanah, we review and rekindle our love for the country in all its many guises.

"And so it goes," Etgar Keret tells us of his character and, by inference, of the Jewish state. "Every night you fall asleep with him struggling to stay awake for the Argentinean finals, and in the morning, there she is, the beautiful, forgiving woman who you love, too, till it hurts."

Shanah Tovah.

Schulich donates $20 million (US) to Technion

Will fund school's faculty of chemistry

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Seymour Schulich believes that one of the best ways to help a country is to promote education.

Last week, the Toronto-based philanthropist finalized a $20-million (US) deal with the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology to fund the school's faculty of chemistry, which now bears his name.

The gift is one of the biggest donations, if not the biggest, ever made by a Canadian to an Israeli university, said Harold (Sonny) Gordon, chair of the Dundee Corporation and special adviser to the president of the Canadian Technion Society.

Gordon approached Schulich about a possible donation following the appearance of a CJN article last year regarding a $20-million donation Schulich made to to the music school at McGill University.

In the article, Schulich was quoted as saying that he had not given significantly to Israeli universities because "they are five times better endowed than the equivalent schools in Canada," but that he might change his mind if he could find a "catalytic" project in Israel.

This summer's war in Lebanon, and the barrage of rocket attacks on northern Israel – particularly in Haifa, where the Technion is located – delayed the arrangements for a month, but they were "well on the way" to being completed when the war broke out, said Gordon.

"I was born on this team," said Schulich, 66, referring to the fact that he is Jewish and wanted to fund an Israeli institution. "When you're on a team, you do one for the team."

In addition, he was impressed by the Technion's similarity to the Massachussetts Institute for Technology, a comparison that is often made. Ninety per cent of Israeli startups are led by Technion graduates, he noted. "As well as being good scientists and engineers, they're good business guys," he said.

Seymour Schulich

The voluble and forthright businessman, who is chair of Newmont Capital Ltd., the merchant banking division of one of the largest gold-mining companies in the world, admits that he "flunked out" of honours chemistry as an undergraduate at McGill University, before receiving his bachelor of science degree in 1961, and his MBA in 1965.

"It was a blessing in disguise," he said in a phone interview last week. "I'm a much better financier than I ever would have been a chemist – I can assure you of that."

Indeed, the Montreal native, whose father was a dress designer and housecoat manufacturer, was listed in the 59th spot among the 100 wealthiest Canadians, with an estimated worth of $714 million, in Canadian Business magazine last December.

Schulich, who left Montreal in 1977, was a co-founder of Franco-Nevada Mining Corporation, which merged with two other companies in 2002 to form Newmont

A NEW YEAR
A NEW BEGINNING.

Rosh Hashanah is traditionally a time to look back at the year just past. It is also a time of looking forward to a New Year... a new beginning.
May this New Year be one of peace. Peace of mind; peace of spirit. And may it bring peace to our homeland, and a new beginning for its people.

Generational connections

(The second of two parts)

Joanna Mirsky Wexler is an impressive young woman. She speaks English, French, Hebrew, Spanish, German and Swahili. She is a singer, accountant and marine biologist. And she is a superb storyteller.

As the director of Camp Kadimah, (about an hour southwest of Halifax, not northeast as I carelessly wrote last week) she uses all her considerable skills, talents and judgment to define and enhance the broad educational experience for the more than 300 young campers under her overall care and responsibility for six weeks in the summer.

From the editor's desk

This past summer I caught merely a glimpse of that broad educational experience. It was exhilarating.

Of course, the 32-year-old, Montreal-born Wexler is not alone at the camp with the campers. She has a dedicated staff of some 125 people. Indeed, one of her staff is her husband, Ezra, who in addition to being the head counsellor, is an accomplished opera singer. The director is quite openly proud of her staff. "It is not uncommon for staff to be here five to six years," Wexler offered as we walked unhurriedly through the campgrounds under the golden sun of a clear Nova Scotia morning. "The reputation of our counsellors is that they care deeply about the campers," she assertively stated.

Together, the two Wexlers – Joanna and Ezra – and the considerably capable staff of Kadimah, transform for their campers the six weeks of summer camp into long-lasting, memorable markers of Jewish identity and belonging.

"It is amazing to see what kind of an impact you can have here," Wexler reflected, as we stood before one of the cabins overlooking the shore of Lake Williams.

"The fact that one person could have had such a strong impact on the the lives of so many people is really very humbling."

She was referring to the late Gershon Yuval, who had been director for only one year in 1963, but had nevertheless, left a profound imprint on the lives of the campers and staff that year and on the camp's folklore and traditions. She mentioned him because only days before, the camp had dedicated a cabin in his memory. We stood at the cabin, formerly Cabin D, so that I could see and read the inscription on the plaque that attests so visibly to Yuval's brief but significant contribution to the Jewish and Zionist ethos of the camp.

The honouring of his memory more than two decades after his service to the camp, with a crop of campers who had no direct knowledge of him, is indicative of the great emphasis that the board of the camp and its staff place on constantly reinforcing the interconnection between the purposes of the camp with its relatively long history, now reaching its 64th year.

"This is a generational camp. It is very likely that the grandparents, parents and children of the same family have all attended here," Wexler remarked. "The board [of the camp] loves this place. Each of the members has their own personal memories of their time here. As a result, they are very supportive of what we try to do."

When asked what it is that she and the staff try to do, Wexler answered succinctly, without hesitation.

"We try to help build Jewish character. We try to inspire in a Jewish way. Really, it is about making connections with the campers and ourselves. What does it mean that we are Jews and Zionists in this tiny part of the world?"

Wexler's pithy characterization of the camp's overall purpose was a remarkable paraphrasing of Kadimah's mission statement – "To build a foundation of Jewish identity and a love of Israel in generations of campers and staff..."

And her reference to "this tiny part of the world" (i.e., the Halifax region) was eloquent proof of her understanding of the deeply formative role that the camp plays in moulding and fashioning the collective – and even individual – sense of identity and character of Atlantic Jewry. (The camp's mission statement says: "A safe, caring community in which to foster knowledge, skills and leadership, for the benefit of Atlantic and Canadian Jewish children.")

On the occasion of the camp's 50th anniversary some 13 years ago, one of its former campers and staff, Michael Soberman, wrote: "In an imperfect world, Kadimah is one of the few places, where for six weeks, we can close ourselves off, spend time with those people who mean the most to us, laugh together and cry together, and campers and staff can begin the timeless task of carving out their own Jewish identity in the security of Camp Kadimah. I never dreamed I would fall so deeply in love with place."

Soberman has not been the only one to fall so deeply in love with Camp Kadimah. Over the years, there have been thousands.

It would be foolish to think that every single camper through 63 years at Kadimah has emerged positively changed and Jewishly primed for life. And it would be equally foolish as well as unfair to fail to acknowledge the far-reaching, beneficial impacts on the lives of our youth of the many other wonderful Jewish camps where we send our children. But the association with place, history and character of Camp Kadimah to Atlantic, and now burgeoning to the wider Canadian Jewry, is unique and deserving of special mention.

One veteran camper, Frank Medjuck, some three decades after his 13 years at Camp Kadimah summed up his experience by writing: "I never had friends again quite like the ones I had then."

After only a brief visit to Camp Kadimah this summer, I could understand why that was so.

Thousands gather to urge end to genocide in Darfur

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

In an effort to put more pressure on the Canadian government to commit to working to end the genocide in Darfur, thousands of Torontonians gathered to show their support at one of 57 rallies held simultaneously around the world.

The Sept. 17 rally – which was also held in cities including Berlin, Cairo, Hong Kong, Kigali, Nairobi, New York, and Paris – marked the one-year anniversary of the United Nations' Responsibility to Protect pledge that calls on the international community to protect populations from crimes against humanity if their own government is unable to do so.

Roméo Dallaire, a retired lieutenant-general and former commander of the UN Assistance Mission in Rwanda who actively speaks out against the genocide in Darfur, was the keynote speaker and an organizer of the rally held at Ramsden Park in Toronto.

He said that if governments of developed nations don't send the troops needed to defuse the current situation in the war-ravaged region of Sudan, the international community will witness a humanitarian crisis on the same scale as the 1994 Rwanda genocide.

"Darfur is tasting, smelling, looking, in every way shape and form like a repetition on a similar scale of what happened in Rwanda 12 years ago. We've had 12 years of studying and debating and bringing in new concepts, great theories and doctrines like the responsibility to protect. But we have seen nothing in the developed world of building the statesmanship and the courage of the political elite to do something about it, and we are going to witness, again, with blood on our hands, the destruction of human beings who are exactly like us," Dallaire said.

The African Union, which is currently the only force in the region, is weak and will be forced out by the end of the month, he added.

Although the UN Security Council voted in August to create a UN peacekeeping force in Sudan, Resolution 1706 said troops would be deployed only with the approval of the Sudanese government. So far, the government has refused to give that consent.

Human rights groups and activists are calling for sanctions against senior Sudanese government officials who stand in the way of the deployment of troops that can bring stability to the region.

But Dallaire said the reluctance of the Sudanese government to comply with the resolution is only part of the reason that troops haven't been deployed to protect a people who have been threatened with rape, murder and starvation since the conflict began in 2003.

He said the reluctance to send UN troops to the region is the fear of casualties, and because there is no political capital in saving lives.

"There is no oil, there is no strategic value, and as such, it is very difficult for nations to argue the essentiality of going in to help and protect human beings," Dallaire said. "We just don't have the guts to go in there and commit ourselves to those human beings even if the government of that nation doesn't want us there."

Dallaire added that the monetary cost to developed nations would be minimal. "We're not asking for 15 billion bucks every month to move and save more than 2.5 million people. We're not even close to those figures," he said. "We need $79 million to keep [the African Union] force in the field from the first of October until the time that the UN forces would come in, which would be the middle of January."

In a statement released a few days before the rally, Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay said, "Canada is working with governments in the region, Security Council members and other international partners to urge the Government of Sudan to act responsibly and accept the UN transition, consistent with UNSC Resolution 1706."

During the rally, MC Justin Trudeau announced the presence of Liberal MP Susan Kadis, NDP MP Olivia Chow and NDP leader Jack Layton. As was the case at the Darfur rallies in Toronto, Washington, D.C., New York and other cities last April, there was a significant Jewish presence at this event.

Among the groups that organized the rally were Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), Canadian Jewish Congress, Hillel Toronto, STAND Canada, Project Equity and Canadian Young Judaea.

Also at the rally, which included performances from music groups, the Muhtadi Drummers and Bedouin Soundclash, was Mohamed Haroun, the president of the Darfur Association of Canada, a Sudanese refugee who was jailed and tortured for seven months in Darfur for distributing leaflets against the government militia's recruiting efforts.

Tragi Mustafa, a Darfurian refugee, a member of CASTS and founder of Save Women Sudan, an organization that aims to inform Sudanese women of their rights, also spoke passionately about the way that rape is being used by the janjaweed, the government militia, as a weapon of war.

She explained that while there are organizations that provide food for refugees, they do not provide the fuel needed to cook the food. Women and girls – some as young as eight who are forced to care for their orphaned siblings – must go into the forests to collect firewood, where they are often attacked by waiting soldiers.

"If she attacks any janjaweed or a man in uniform [who attempts to rape her], she is going to go to jail," she said adding that she is frustrated with the case of a 15-year-old girl who is sitting in prison for murder after killing a soldier who attempted to rape her.

Ben Fine, executive director of Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND) Canada, called on youth to do everything in their power to pressure the government to intervene.

"It is our responsibility to provide the political will to push our government and tell them that we demand that they uphold it. We can blame our decision-makers, and we should, but what it comes down to is our ability and our determination to mobilize ourselves to... step up," Fine said.

propaganda onslaught against the Jewish state in the wake of its determination to fight back and defend itself vigorously, without apology to anyone, for the right to exist as a sovereign Jewish state in the "Muslim Middle East."

Thus, we saw and heard coverage of and commentary on the war in south Lebanon that all but ignored the fact that rockets were deliberately fired at Jewish civilians every day; that Iran and Syria were the weapons-dispensing hands that controlled Hezbollah; and that Sheik Hassan Nasrallah is not merely a stocky, boyishly young-looking defender of the downtrodden Lebanese Shia, but rather a zealous, fanatic and scheming murderer of Jews.

For supporters of Israel, the distorted portrayal of the war and the inversion of the values underlying that portrayal were, as ever, disconcerting. Worse. Perhaps it was an ominous foreboding of a future in which the unceasing campaign to deligitimize the Jewish people will bring about an erosion in the support and understanding for Israel and for the justice of its cause.

Rosh Hashanah arrives, therefore, just in time tomorrow night to help us navigate through our edgy feelings of existential angst and worry.

The holiday itself contains within it a feeling of "anxiety" and vulnerability as our personal destinies hang in the balance, as our own futures are to be decided imminently through the judgment of the Heavenly Court.

And yet, against this belief of vulnerability and uncertainty, we also believe deeply that we can influence our fate through action in this world. Tshuvah, tfillah, v'tzedakah (repentance, prayer and good deeds) can alter the potential sting and bitterness of the Divine decree.

This belief in the power of our own action is one of the defining motifs of the Rosh Hashanah. It propels our individual, forward movement from one year to the next and sustains our belief in the possibility that goodness will always triumph.

We can change the course of our own lives.

We can change history, if we but try.

Moreover, the seeming enormity of the task at hand has never detered us. As Rabbi David Hartman of Jerusalem has implored: "Despair is not an option for the Jewish people."

We have a mission. We have a purpose.

It falls to us all, wherever we live, to help steer the course of Jewish history toward the highest aspirations of Jewish peoplehood and statehood.

There is a powerfully evocative image in the High Holy Day prayer Unetaneh Tokef of a vast blast of the shofar that yields, in its resonance and reverberations, only a still small voice.

So too, the vast blasts of the deadly guns of war have inevitably given way to the "still, small voice" of introspection, reflection and self-assessment.

As he sits serenely upon the metal box merely metres from a tank in the open field, the young soldier is listening for the still, small voice stirring in his heart.

We too must listen for the still, small voice stirring in our own hearts. We must not recoil from trying to influence destiny.

And when the young soldier heard his still, small voice, he undoubtedly also thanked God for having brought him safely to a new day. Just as we too will do this holiday.

Shanah tovah.

We will have to agree to disagree

I recall the debates about the original Toronto eruv as to whether some of the leniencies used in its parameters were acceptable ("Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" CJN, Aug. 24 and 31). This resulted in two distinct camps of Orthodox Toronto Jews – those who relied on the eruv and carried on the Sabbath and those who did not. The reconfiguration of the eruv under Rabbi Shlomo Miller's guidance so that stricter criteria are now met can only be viewed as a positive and helpful development.

Similarly, the raising of standards at the Kashruth Council of Canada is positive in that there is more universal acceptance of the council's supervision. Rabbi Gedalia Felder once told me that the Kashruth Council was founded in a virtual vacuum and unless certain leniencies were accepted at that time, it would have been almost impossible to establish kashruth in even a minimally acceptable manner for the average household. In today's environment, there are many more marketplace options available, so these leniencies are no longer necessary. There is indeed a demand that the kashrut supervision be as airtight as possible so that the observant consumer can have confidence in the food he consumes.

I have no quarrel with the so-called "centrist" Orthodox community as long as its members follow the Torah and its commandments along with the halachic norms that have been developed by our recognized rabbis over the centuries. Obviously, there are points of debate and contention, but nothing that cannot be discussed civilly over a l'chaim at a kiddush. There are issues on which we will have to agree to disagree. However, the resentments and accusations of some who may have a "chip on their shoulder" is certainly not helpful in any way and it is certainly not conductive to ahavat Yisrael (love of fellow Jews), which is so necessary today. We have enough enemies from without.

The reason for surviving

Martin Kalson ("Toronto's Orthodox community," letter, Sept. 7) ignores an important factor necessary for any group's survival. While we must be concerned about basic survival, we cannot lose sight of the reason for this survival. Without a meaning to Jewishness, the very forces for basic survival are also weakened. Jewishness has to matter. The State of Israel has to have purpose. Otherwise, why fight for it?

It is within this perspective that we can understand the significance of the present issues and debates within the Orthodox community. Emotional reasons for Jewish survival wax and wane. For one generation, the feeling of Jewishness, and the feeling that Jewishness is important, was important. For subsequent generations, the feelings diminish and are not enough to fight a battle of identity. Assimilation and intermarriage are the results.

The debates and discussions within the Orthodox community reflect a Jewishness that gives purpose to Jewish identity and declares that Jewishness has significance. There may be disagreement, but one thing is certain – concern over such issues reflects a perception of Jewishness that has meaning and purpose.

In order to survive, we must always recognize the reasons for the importance of this survival. Without such purpose, even basic survival is not attainable. While we may debate the priority of these issues and the conclusions we may have to these questions, as strange as it may seem, "the issues of bugs in lettuce and the number of days of Creation" reflect a concern for this purpose.

Holy Blossom rabbis

In the article "Holy Blossom to celebrate its 150th anniversary" (CJN, Sept. 7), the various periods in Holy Blossom Temple's historical journey ended with Rabbi Gunther Plaut. There was no mention of the last 28 years.

Since Rabbi Plaut, Holy Blossom has been fortunate to have as spiritual leaders Rabbi Harvey Field, Rabbi Dow Marmur and Rabbi John Moscowitz, our present senior rabbi. Sharing the pulpit with Rabbi Moscowitz are Rabbi Yael Splansky, Rabbi Jason Rosenberg and Rabbi Edward Goldfarb. Cantor Benjamin Maissner joined the congregation in 1979.

Rabbi Marmur came to Holy Blossom in 1983. A dedicated and brilliant rabbi/teacher, he accelerated the Plaut legacy to move the congregation to a more centrist position within Judaism. Rabbi Marmur taught that tradition and social justice must be a part of Reform Judaism and that Reform Jews must be God's partners in repairing the world.

Also, Lewis Samuel's name was spelled incorrectly in the article. Samuel was the president of the congregation for most of the years between 1862 and 1880.

5766: A turbulent year for Israel

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

The Jewish year 5766 was one of the most dramatic in Israel's history. It saw a sitting prime minister dismantle his ruling party and then suffer a massive stroke that left him comatose, a terrorist group that refused to recognize Israel's existence elected to the pinnacle of Palestinian power, and a war with another terrorist group in which more than 100 rockets slammed into Israeli cities and towns nearly every day for more than a month.

And that's just for starters.

Facing intense opposition within his Likud party, then-prime minister Ariel Sharon broke away from the Likud in November 2005 to form the Kadima party. The move significantly altered Israel's political landscape, placing Kadima and the Labor party at the centre of the political spectrum, with parties to the left and right seemingly marginalized.

Riding a wave of popularity, Sharon seemed certain to be re-elected by a huge margin, with a mandate to continue his policy of withdrawal from Palestinian territory following the unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and northern West Bank in the summer of 2005.

But it was not to be. After an initial small stroke in December, Sharon suffered a major stroke Jan. 4 and fell into a deep coma from which he has not emerged.

His deputy Ehud Olmert took over as acting prime minister, paving the way for his election to the premiership in late March, on a promise to complete the process of separating Israel and the Palestinians by enacting a massive unilateral withdrawal from almost all of the West Bank.

There also were precedent-setting elections among the Palestinians. On Jan. 25, the fundamentalist Hamas swept to power, ousting the secular Fatah party after almost 40 years of uninterrupted rule.

Israel refused to have any dealings with the Hamas government unless it recognized Israel's right to exist, accepted previous Israeli-Palestinian accords and renounced violence. Most of the international community backed the Israeli position, severed diplomatic contacts and cut off aid when Hamas refused to meet the demands.

The result was violence, with the Palestinians taking advantage of the end of the occupation in Gaza to launch daily rocket barrages at Israeli towns near the border. Violence escalated after Palestinian gunmen from Hamas and other factions killed two Israeli soldiers and kidnapped a third, Gilad Shalit, on June 25.

On the northern border, Hezbollah, a terrorist group financed and armed by Iran and Syria and with seats in the Lebanese government, had built up an enormous rocket capability after Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000. Shortly after Hamas captured Shalit, Hezbollah opened a second front with a cross-border raid July 12 that killed eight Israeli soldiers. Two others – Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev – were kidnapped and dragged back to Lebanon.

Hezbollah thought Israel's answer would be the sort of limited, pinprick responses it had carried out after other Hezbollah attacks over the past six years, but in this case the group badly miscalculated.

Israel launched airstrikes against Hezbollah targets and Lebanese infrastructure and called up ground forces for a possible land invasion. Olmert was determined to change a situation in which Hezbollah felt it could attack Israeli soldiers with impunity, confident that Israel would not take strong retaliatory action for fear of attack from the 14,000 or so rockets that Hezbollah had trained on Israeli cities and towns.

There were other strategic considerations too. Israeli military planners saw Hezbollah as the long arm of Iran, building up its rocket power to attack Israel if the Jewish state or the United States took military action to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. The Israeli war effort was aimed at restoring Israel's deterrent power, removing the Hezbollah rocket threat and creating conditions for the return of the abducted soldiers.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert

The initial air strikes were highly successful: in just 39 minutes on the night of July 12, the Israeli air force destroyed most of Hezbollah's Iranian-made Zilzal long-range rockets, which were believed to be capable of hitting Tel Aviv. Over the next few days, the air force reduced Hezbollah's Beirut headquarters to rubble, destroyed weapon stores and killed dozens of elite Hezbollah fighters.

But it soon became apparent that incessant Hezbollah rocket fire from mobile launchers could only be stopped by a large-scale ground operation. This did not materialize until the last few days of the war, and as a result, Hezbollah was able to continue firing more than 100 rockets a day at Israeli civilians in the north and claim victory on the grounds that Israel had been unable to stop the Katyushas.

United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701, which brought the fighting to an end on Aug. 14, called for an embargo on arms to be imposed on Hezbollah, the militia to be removed from southern Lebanon and for the area to be patrolled by the Lebanese army, backed by a large UN force.

Increasingly beleaguered at home, Olmert presented these postwar developments as a major change in the strategic balance. Israeli leaders also argued that Hezbollah had lost between 500 and 800 fighters and taken a far more severe beating than was generally realized.

But the mood in Israel after the war was one of anger at what was widely seen as the government's poor management of the ground war. Military analysts and former generals were highly critical of the failure to order an early large-scale attack, and reservists returning from the front complained of confused orders, a lack of confidence in their superiors and shortages of food, water and equipment.

Pressure mounted on Olmert to set up a state commission of inquiry with the power to subpoena witnesses, impound evidence and recommend the dismissal of political and military leaders. The prime minister responded by establishing three lesser committees to examine political, military and home-front shortcomings in the conduct of the war.

By year's end, Olmert had acknowledged that his grand plan for a West Bank withdrawal would have to be put on a back burner, and Hamas was trying to get Palestinian terrorist factions to agree to a temporary truce and to establish a national unity government to break the international boycott.

Overall, 5766 generally was a good year for the Israeli economy, though the war in the north led to an estimated one per cent loss in economic growth, which had been projected at more than four per cent for the second year running.

The war also generated demands on the government's purse strings – more than $1 billion for rehabilitation of northern Israel and an additional $5 billion for the defence budget.

At the same time, a poverty report in late August revealed that 1.6 million Israelis, or more than one-quarter of the population, was living below the poverty line. The fiscal challenge is to meet the military and social needs without creating inflationary pressure.

Despite hostilities, Israel's economy booming

By SIMON GRIVER
IPS

The sale of Israel's Iscar Metalworking Cos. to Warren Buffett for $4 billion (all figures US) and its software company Mercury Interactive Inc. to Hewlett-Packard (HP) for $4.5 billion has made the headlines of the world's financial press in recent months.

All the more impressive is that these high profile transactions are only the tip of a high-tech-led economy that encompasses hundreds of successful advanced technology companies and enjoyed 5.3 per cent growth in 2005 and over 6.6 per cent in the first half of 2006.

"The past year was one of the best years Israel's economy has ever known," observes Reuven Kuvent, General Manager of Dun & Bradstreet Israel, the global business information specialists. "Israel flourished by almost every economic parameter."

According to the Israeli government's Central Bureau of Statistics, exports of goods and services rose by 10.5 per cent in 2005 to $42.8 billion, and continued climbing in the first half of 2006 by an additional 6.5 per cent to almost $23 billion. The trade deficit has virtually disappeared, with imports reaching $23.2 billion in the first half of 2006. Unemployment has dropped to 8.8 per cent from 11 per cent three years ago.

The only cloud on the economic horizon was the outbreak of hostilities in Israel's northern region during July. However, since the fighting lasted for weeks rather than months, most experts did not expect the Israeli economy to be badly hit. Standard & Poor's Rating Services did not reduce Israel's credit rating following the outbreak of fighting and said "strong demand for Israel's high-tech goods and services and buoyant capital inflows have underpinned a further strengthening of the Israeli economy."

High-tech is unquestionably the motor that drives Israel's economic engine, with over 50 per cent of the country's exports falling into this category. An additional 30 per cent of overseas sales have advanced technology components. Israel is a global leader in such areas as mobile/cellular communications, Internet applications, software services and solutions, semiconductors, medical devices, electro-optics and electronic accessories for defence and homeland security equipment.

But the Israeli economy is also much more than high-tech. Iscar, which became Warren Buffett's first Israeli investment, is a mid-tech company that manufactures industrial cutting tools for metal machining. What Iscar's founder in 1952 the veteran entrepreneur Stef Wertheimer shares with today's generation of young high-tech Israeli executives, is a visionary grasp of innovation and flexibility to meet fast-changing market needs.

Nor is Israel's largest industrial manufacturer a classic high-tech firm. Teva Pharmaceuticals, which expects 2006 sales to reach $7 billion, is the world's largest producer of generic drugs, although $1.3 billion in sales derives from an ethical drug, Copaxone®, for the treatment of Multiple Sclerosis, which is the fruit of Israel's biotech industry.

If the early Zionists worried that Israel's economic development would be hampered by the lack of natural resources, then the arrival of the high-tech age of knowledge-based industries has solved that problem. With leading universities and more people with PhDs per capita than any other country, there is no shortage of knowledge in Israel. Moreover, the country's military needs and national service in the Israel Defence Forces means that many academic Israelis also have the ability to make quick, real-time decisions and meet short-term targets with flexible and innovative thinking.

Even the country's few natural resources – phosphates in the Negev and minerals in the Dead Sea – now earn Israel Chemicals $3 billion in sales per year due to improved extraction processes. Israel has also used technology to overcome the region's water shortages, with much of the country's needs now supplied by desalination and recycling of wastewater.

But the upswing in Israel's economy has not yet helped Israel's poorest and most needy. With Israel's richest 10 per cent earning an average of 13 times more than the bottom 10 per cent, only the United States has a wider gap between rich and poor in the world's developed economies.

The right question

For most of us, Hamlet's "To be or not to be" is not the question. Rather we are challenged by "how" to be. How shall we live our lives? What shall we do to make life vital and even good?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Especially during this holiday season, we formally ask ourselves "what can we do better?" Self-appraisal is good, but where does it lead us? As we look back, do we see our errors or our needs, our gains or our absences? Do we translate this quest for self-evaluation into a list of missing things or lost opportunities? Most importantly, do we use this opportunity to count our blessings as we admit our human failings. It's a demanding, double-sided task, yet it's quite important. As we recount our sins and promise to do better, somehow we also need to acknowledge the gifts of living.

As many of you know, I spent part of the summer with my mother, 88, and mother-in-law, 90, and got quite a lesson. In our daily activities, despite pain, disabilities and serious worries, both women showed a level of fortitude, optimism and enthusiasm that was amazing. Even after all these years of ups and downs, of loss and loneliness, they were both filled with a sense of excitement and goodness, of appreciation and acceptance of life.

I wonder if we can match that? Can our quest for improvement and progress be reconciled with our acceptance of what is?

Recently at a wedding, my husband blessed the couple with his standard, "May your love be renewed each day as God renews your lives." This time, his words signaled an immediate reaction. We take so much for granted. Life is a gift. Each moment, even with all its pains and trouble, is a benefit. Simply being alive should fill us with wonder and excitement. Incomplete, imperfect, even painful and fearsome, yet wonderful. Life is awesome!

But we as humans get more. We get love. What an amazing gift, to love and to be loved. Whether love of parents, spouse, children, family, friends and even pets, to love is to be alive and to be granted the greatest good. It marks our species and gives meaning somehow to our meager existence.

So as the season descends on us with all its powerful imagery of repentance, return and renewal, I think we need to offset it with a sense of appreciation and acceptance. Our Jewish tradition teaches a sense of wonderment and goodness, a sense of blessing and self-acceptance. Yes, we regret past omissions and commissions. Yes, we want to do better next year. But this year was not a total washout. We lived, loved and grew. That's the essence of how to be.

Jewish history around the clock

As we greet 5767, how can we comprehend the great span of time our people has lived? Let's try it on a 24-hour clock.

At midnight, Abraham and Sarah leave Ur. At 2:34 a.m., Joseph is sold into Egypt. Moses celebrates the first Passover prior to the exodus and giving of the Torah at 3:12 a.m.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Things don't go so well at first in the Promised Land: the period of the Judges lasts until 4:17, when Saul becomes the first King of Israel. At 4:29, David brings together the fractious tribes and captures Jerusalem. At 4:40, his son Solomon dedicates the first Temple in Jerusalem.

Again, turmoil from 4:58 to 7:12 a.m. Solomon's kingdom falls into two pieces, the southern ruled by the Davidic dynasty, the northern one subject to palace intrigues and foreign adventures, falling to the Assyrians. During those hours, prophets rail against the evils of idolatry. At 7:12 a.m., tragedy strikes: Jerusalem burns and its leaders are sent into exile by the waters of Babylon.

There is hope. At 7:37, exiles return to Jerusalem and set about rebuilding the city and the Second Temple. At 8:52 a.m., Alexander appears and the area falls to Hellenistic hegemony. At 9:51, the Hasmoneans lead a revolt against Antiochus and for less than an hour – till 10:32 – rule Judea until it is occupied by Rome.

At 10:42, a momentous event: Herod begins building his magnificent Temple Mount. Alas, by 11:22 it lies in smoking ruin. Enraged, the Judeans turn to a false messiah, Bar Kochba, and at 11:46 are decisively slaughtered at Betar, sending hundreds of thousands of refugees into the Roman diaspora. Some survive the debacle, and under Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi the Mishnah is redacted a little after noon at 12:19 p.m., not a moment too soon, as the fortunes of Jews in Byzantine Palestine erode and the Babylonian diaspora becomes ascendant.

By 2:68, the Babylonian Talmud is completed. At 3:03 p.m. Byzantine repression gives way to the Arab conquest, and Jews in the land receive better treatment than under the Christian emperors. From 3:56 to 5:34 the Geonim are the masters of Halachah (and we get Saadia's prayer book), and from 4:41 to 7:12, Jews in Spain enjoy a Golden Age. At 5:49 p.m., Rashi writes his luminous commentaries, while at 5:56, the Crusaders destroy Jerusalem in the process of liberating it.

At 6:36 p.m., Maimonides delivers his masterful codes. From 7:12 to 7:50 p.m. the Black Death ravishes Europe and causes even more suffering to Europe's Jewries, who begin their eastward trek to Poland/Russia.

At 8:25, the same minute Jews are finally expelled from Spain, Columbus makes a momentous discovery. At 8:55 p.m. the Ari in Safed inspires a long line of mystics. At 9:26, the Cossacks begin their terrible conquests, and at 9:31, Jews are the victims of Shabtai Zvi's mendacious promises of redemption. (An aside – at 9:28, the first Jews arrive in the Americas.)

The pace quickens. At 9:58 p.m., the'Baal Shem Tov ignites the chassidic movement. At 10:20, European Jews hear the Emancipation proclaimed. At 10:55, eastern European Jewry begins its massive migration to North America. At 11:02, the Dreyfus trial leads Theodor Herzl to inspire the first Zionist Conference and the beginnings of modern Zionism at 11:03. At 11:12, comes the Balfour Declaration.

A terrible moment: at 11:19, Adolf Hitler becomes chancellor of Germany, and from 11:22 to 11:25 in the evil Kingdom of Night, six million Jews are massacred.

At 11:26, the State of Israel is proclaimed. At 11:31, the Yemenite community is airlifted to Israel, and at 11:38, the Six Day War brings the Temple Mount and Kotel back into the Jewish state for the first time in 2,000 years – or should that be 12 hours and 16 minutes?

At 11:44, the Yom Kippur War breaks out, and at 11:51, the aliyah of Soviet Jews becomes a tidal wave. At 11:52, the Ethiopian redemption begins, and at 11:53, Yizhak Rabin dies from an assassin's bullet. At 11:56, war in Lebanon and the New Year 5767.

We've got some time left in our history and the meanings are embedded in our rituals of memory. Soon we'll be into a second day. May our children's children see its glory. In the meantime, Shanah Tovah.

A cool breeze heralds the new year

Here in Edmonton, the leaves on the trees are already changing colour. The tomatoes have turned red on the vines. The apple trees are heavy with the best crop of fruit ever. There is a nip in the night air. The school term has begun at all levels of education. The summer has come to an end.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

In so many ways, a new year is beginning.

I have always felt that Rosh Hashanah falls at the right time of the year. As the long, green days of summer move into the colourful autumn season, it feels right, particularly this year, that a new year should be commencing. At Rosh Hashanah, we traditionally look back over the past year, taking stock of our lives, and look forward with optimism to a fresh start.

In the past year, various members of my family have struggled with health problems. And our family has mourned the passing of our beloved brother-in-law as well as a dear family friend.

Internationally, there is so much discord. We have seen the tragedies of war in the Middle East and the continued threat to the survival of Israel in a hostile environment. In addition to these hostilities, we have seen the vile expression of anti-Semitism espoused by the leader of Iran.

It is with sadness that we see the conflict continue in Afghanistan where our Canadian soldiers are dying. And whether it be the fight against Hezbollah, the Taliban or other nefarious organizations, the world continues to witness the spectre of international terrorism on too many fronts.

Nature itself sometimes deals an unkind blow to this earth. Over the past year, people in the north-central Gulf Coast of the United States have been trying to rebuild their lives after the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina. It is hard to fathom the devastation and tremendous loss of life caused by the earthquake in Pakistan. The scourges of disease, famine, homelessness and war still plague many parts of the world and ravage the populations of large areas in the sub-Saharan nations in Africa.

And in our affluent country, people struggle with poverty and homelessness.

Personally, it has been a challenging but rewarding year. Our children have pursued their careers in classical music, Canadian diplomacy and computer technology. Like many modern parents, we watch and cheer for them – sometimes from great distances.

In addition to my professional responsibilities and the monthly responsibility of writing an article for this publication, I have continued to serve as president for the John Humphrey Centre for Peace and Human Rights. That organization is dedicated to the promulgation of the various principles and values contained in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights through educational activities directed primarily at youth.

The continued success of the projects and publications of the centre have been particularly rewarding this year. The centre is sponsoring an international conference in Edmonton from Oct. 20 to 22 on the topic of "Building World Peace: The Role of Religions in Human Rights," and a sister youth conference on the topic of "Building World Peace: Some Assembly Required." (For further details on these conferences, including registration information, see: johnhumphreycentre.org. and www.building worldpeace.com.) In August 2007, the centre will also host, in Edmonton, the first United Nations Youth Assembly to be held outside of New York. These projects bring a sense of purpose, a feeling of optimism and hope to our work.

Each year will have its share of tragedy and unhappiness. But with the beginning of a new year, we all share in a spirit of anticipation and renewal.

It is time for a new year. It is time for a new beginning. It is time for a renewed commitment to tikkun olam – working as partners to repair the world.

As the sound of the shofar ushers in the new year, we all look forward to a good year, a year of peace, a year of hope, good health, friendship and love. Ktav v'chatimah shanah tovah u'metukah. May you be inscribed and sealed for a good and sweet new year. Shanah Tovah.

The Kirshner File

A survey of British Jews

This year marks the 350th anniversary of the readmission of Jews to Britain, known as the resettlement.

King Edward I expelled Jews from his kingdom in 1290, bringing to an abrupt and tragic end the medieval era in British Jewish history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For almost 400 years, individuals of Jewish ancestry visited and even lived in Britain, but only as putative Christians. As openly professing Jews, they were officially barred from setting foot on the island nation.

But in 1656, after receiving a petition from Menasseh Ben Israel, a Portuguese New Christian raised and educated in Amsterdam, Britain's republican leader, Oliver Cromwell, finally agreed to readmit Jews.

As Todd M. Endelman points out in his meticulously researched and enlightening book, The Jews of Britain 1656 to 2000 (University of California Press), no formal order of readmission was actually ever issued by Cromwell. What happened was that the Council of State – Britain's governing body – responded favourably to a petition requesting permission for Jews to gather privately for prayer and to acquire a burial ground.

Endelman, a professor of modern Jewish history at the University of Michigan, speculates that Cromwell "must have provided [Ben Israel and his associates] with some assurances that they would not be disturbed, for in the months that followed, an avowedly Jewish community emerged."

Endelman further speculates that informal readmission had important repercussions. By removing the topic of Jewish readmission from the public agenda, Cromwell denied ammunition to the opponents of resettlement – mainly Christian merchants who feared competition from Jews and clergymen who claimed that the exercise of Judaism in a Christian state would be blasphemous– and the issue faded away, never to re-emerge.

Prior to the expulsion in 1290, Jews had resided in Britain for more than a century, having arrived from France in the wake of the Norman conquest. But having lost their financial usefulness, due to state restrictions on moneylending, Jews found themselves in a vulnerable position.

Until the resettlement, Britain was officially bereft of Jews. But in actual terms, clusters of Jewish New Christians from Portugal and Holland, primarily merchants and doctors but adventurers and drifters as well, continued living there. Among them was a New Christian named Rodriego Lopez, a physician who may have inspired William Shakespeare's Shylock in The Merchant of Venice.

The Puritans were the first to propose the readmission of Jews, being convinced that their resettlement would hasten the coming of the millennium.

Millenarian sentiment gained ground in the first decades of the 17th century, and news of this development aroused the interest of Ben Israel, a messianist who had been in contact with Puritans in Amsterdam.

Messianic considerations do not appear to have interested Cromwell, who likely saw the commercial advantages of attracting Jewish capital to Britain and away from its chief mercantile rival, Holland.

In the wake of the restoration of the Stuart monarchy in 1660, Christian merchants in London attempted to impose onerous restrictions on their Jewish competitors, but to no avail. Charles II and James II protected the new Jewish community, while William of Orange encouraged the immigration of a small but steady trickle of Sephardi Jews from Holland and the Dutch and British colonies.

Tending to be merchants, commodity brokers, dealers in precious stones and jewelry, commercial clerks and physicians, a few of the Jewish newcomers were immensely wealthy. Yet, as Endelman notes, alongside them were miserably poor Jews.

Segueing to a related topic, he writes, "The most pressing religious problem facing the Sephardi community in the half-century after readmission was making the transition from New Christian to professing Jew."

The majority of Sephardim who arrived in Britain in the 17th century had lived as Catholics for much of their lives. But now, in Britain, they were free to practise Judaism. Nevertheless, some continued to live as New Christians.

Since no charter was issued or legislation passed to formalize their status, Jews were never sure about their civic rights.

In practice, they faced major disabilities, being barred from holding public office, attending universities or entering certain professions. The position of Jews in Britain during that period was, nonetheless, superior to that of Jews in other countries.

Still, Jews were seen as a distinct national group, with their own peculiar cultural habits, mental outlook, religious customs and historical memories. When the diarist Samuel Pepys visited the Bevis Mark synagogue, now one of the oldest in Europe, he observed that the worshippers were "more like brutes than people [who] know the true God."

During the century after readmission, Sephardi Jews in London were joined by Ashkenazim from Holland, Poland and the German states. By the mid-18th century, when Britain was home to about 7,000 Jews, the Ashkenazim outnumbered the Sephardim.

In London, where Jews were most concentrated, they were strongly identified with certain trades: second-hand clothes, oranges and lemons, spectacles, costume jewelry, sponges, lead pencils, inexpensive framed pictures, slippers, cakes and candies, glassware, sealing wax and belt buckles, belts, shoe buckles, watches, snuff boxes and crystal buttons.

Menasseh Ben Israel, circa 1642

Assimilation was a temptation in Jewish upper class circles, and Endelman cites the case of Samson Gideon (1699-1762), the richest Jew in the country, to prove his point. Giedon married a Protestant, baptized his newborn children and married off his daughter, Elizabeth, to a nobleman. (In this connection, Endelman points out that virtually all the descendants of Sephardim who rose to prominence in the 17th and 18th centuries are now Christians).

The mass of Jews, however, married within the faith and regarded themselves as members of a distinct people.

Christians viewed Jews, even assimilated ones, as different, with the result that anti-Semitic stereotypes were quite common. But these traditional perceptions were counter-balanced by a strong philosemitic current, Endelman observes.

At the start of the 19th century, the majority of Jews were immigrants or the children of immigrants. But over the next 75 years, poverty ceased being their defining characteristic, and on the eve of mass migration from Eastern Europe, most Jews in Victorian Britain were middle class.

The elite, consisting of some 200 families based in London, from the Rothschilds to the Sassoons, dominated the leadership of communal organizations and synagogues.

The emancipation of British Jewry occurred in piecemeal fashion from 1830 to 1871, with Parliament being the central front in that battle. The campaign was supported by Whigs, who were committed to religious freedom and civil rights; progressive Conservatives, who had broken with the mainstream party; and radicals and non-conformists, who sought to weaken the power of the Church of England.

The community was radically transformed by the influx of more than 100,000 Jewish immigrants between 1881 to 1914. This influx endowed Anglo-Jewry, yet again, with a foreign-born, lower-class caste. The bulk of the newcomers settled in London's East End, but some found their way to Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham and Glasgow.

Endelman says that anti-Semitism in the interwar interregnum from 1918 to 1939 was prevalent enough to affect almost every Jew in the country.

Occupational discrimination was common, admission to private schools and colleges could be problematic, and hotels could be off-limits to Jews.

The problem was exacerbated by serious writers such as Graham Greene, H.G. Wells, John Buchan and Agatha Christie, who populated their novels with offensive Jewish characters.

Professional anti-Semitic agitators of the ilk of Arnold Leese, Henry Hamilton Beamish and Sir Oswald Mosley tried to introduce the "Jewish question" into public discourse.

Britain's mandate in Palestine caused tensions, too.

Since World War II, anti-Semitism has waxed and waned, depending, in part, on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

But according to Endelman, the demographic health of the community today is threatened as never before by assimilation, ignorance of Jewish learning and lore and indifference to ritual and worship.

Four centuries after Jews were readmitted to Britain, the community is in decline, demographically at least.

CUPE sponsors parade float urging Israel boycott

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The 30,000 union members and activists who marched in the annual Toronto Labour Day Parade were treated to music, costumes, jugglers – and a CUPE Ontario float dedicated to the union's resolution calling for a boycott against Israel.

More than 1,000 CUPE members and their families took part in the Sept. 4 parade that began at University Avenue and Dundas Street and ended at the Canadian National Exhibition.

There were 50 or 60 floats, said CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan. Some were in support of workers' rights, others called for an end to privatization and tuition hikes, but perhaps the most controversial was his union's float, which featured a large banner by the newly formed group Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid (CAIA) that read "End Israeli Apartheid."

Float from the Labour Day parade

A press release by the coalition, which was formed in January, said the "CAIA is marching with CUPE Ontario to support the historic Resolution [50]... to move our struggle in solidarity with the Palestinian intifadah forward." The group was referring to a resolution passed in late May at CUPE Ontario's convention in Ottawa that condemned Israel's security barrier and called an "international campaign of boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel until it recognizes the Palestinian right to self-determination."

CAIA called on the community to march with CUPE Ontario in the parade "in order to send a loud and clear message in support of CUPE's historic Resolution 50 and the boycott of Israeli apartheid."

Ryan said that while there was a float put up by the CUPE council in Toronto in support of Resolution 50, he was unsure if CUPE members behind the float joined forces with CAIA.

"I don't know if it was the coalition, but there were some CUPE locals who had a float dealing with Resolution 50... As far as I know, they were joined by community members who came into the parade and marched with them," Ryan said.

"People join the Labour Day parade all the time, different groups join in support. If you're asking me if I would be surprised that different groups would support CUPE's resolution, I would say no, not at all."

He estimated that between 60 and 70 people marched in support of the resolution and added that the Jewish Women's Committee to End the Occupation were there carrying banners that read "Not in my name."

"It was a mixed group of people, not just the Resolution 50 people. There are a lot of people upset with the State of Israel and the policies towards Palestinians," Ryan said.

He said the float was not part of a demonstration, just part of the parade.

Ryan, who was mostly at the front of the parade leading a CUPE Ontario contingent that was marching with the Canadian Federation of Students against tuition hikes, said he assumed CUPE members were handing out literature in support of the resolution, but he didn't see this personally.

Insurers again reject policies for travel to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's back to square one for financial planner David Brown.

Almost two years ago, Brown led an effort to convince Canadian insurers to write life insurance policies for applicants who planned to travel to Israel. As the intifadah heated up, insurance companies began rejecting policies for travellers to the Jewish state.

After some lobbying and in the aftermath of U.S. legislation banning the practice as discriminatory, Canadian insurers agreed to write life insurance policies for clients who planned to visit Israel for less than eight weeks and if the policies paid out no more than $5 million.

However, Brown recently learned that a number of major Canadian insurers – including Manulife Financial, Standard Life and Canada Life – are again declining policies if the applicant plans to travel to Israel.

"The insurance companies have decided they are not writing anybody going to Israel," he said. "Because of the battle with Hezbollah, they've now closed down."

Brown, a financial advisor at Al G. Brown & Associates, a family firm in the financial services industry, learned of the change when he was turned down after applying for a policy for a client who was planning to visit Israel in December. He canvassed several other companies and was rejected each time.

Brown said the new practice does not affect pre-existing policy-holders. These people, who acquired life insurance after disclosing their intention to travel to Israel, will still be covered. Only new applicants are being turned away, he said.

Jasmine Mangalaseril, a spokesperson for Manulife, acknowledged that "our policy regarding new insurance applications for those who travel to Israel has changed because of the recent escalation of violence in the area and travel warnings issued by the Canadian government.

"Since travel risks for a country are reviewed regularly, the underwriting position will change if the risk changes," she said. "The list is kept current by world events and travel warnings issued by the Canadian government.

"We will review the current change at the end of September. Any changes will be based on Canadian government travel guidelines," she added.

As of last week, the website of Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada "advises against all travel to southern Israel [where] rockets fired from the Gaza Strip have reached as far as Ashkelon and Sderot. Travel to the region surrounding the Gaza Strip is strongly discouraged."

The travel warning, which urged Canadians to leave the specified regions, goes on to say, "While a ceasefire has come into effect between Israel and Hezbollah forces, the situation in the northern region of Israel remains unstable. Therefore, Canadians should maintain a high level of personal security awareness at all times as the security situation could deteriorate rapidly without notice."

Brown said life insurance is still being written in the United States, where federal law prohibits discrimination against travellers to Israel. Canada does not have such a law. Instead, insurers were persuaded two years ago that travel to Israel was not significantly more dangerous than travel to other countries.

When he first brought his concerns to the large insurance companies, he argued there were no hard data to warrant including Israel in a group of high-risk countries that included Afghanistan, Iraq, North Korea, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Syria. Today, Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada warns against visiting specified areas in Israel, as well as specified areas of Indonesia, Sri Lanka and the North Caucasus region of Russia, including Chechnya.

You can choose from velvet, satin, suede or leather, it can be crocheted or woven, or you can custom-design it to contain your name, Mickey Mouse, SpongeBob SquarePants or your sports team logo.

Men can choose from designs advertised as "masculine without being boring," and for women, there's a choice in "beaded wire, decorated with semi-precious stones that allows you to embrace your tradition and still look very feminine."

If it's not yet clear what's under discussion, it's the once-humble kippah, the head-covering worn by Jewish men and, today, in some circles, by Jewish women, as well. For 15 centuries, the Western Jewish head covering almost always took the form of a black skullcap (exchanged for white on High Holy Days or celebrations) and its sole statement was religious piety. But with rabbis qualifying virtually anything as a "kosher" head-covering these days, the kippah has more recently come to signify a lot more than Jewish observance. Today, when it no longer takes courage to wear this instantly identifiable mark of a Jew in public, the kippah has become for many either a fashion statement or a declaration of sociological and political affiliation, or both – and nowhere more so than in Israel.

Amid the flowering of kippot into a garden of shapes, colours and sizes, the large, smooth, bowl-shaped skullcap made from black velvet, satin or cloth lives on in haredi circles, where it remains de rigueur. Even in Israel, however, a sharp eye can discern small differences that have large meanings.

Sons of the community may express teenage rebellion by wearing their skullcaps slightly smaller in size, or even wearing them crocheted from black embroidery thread rather than made from fabric – a minor bid for independence that nonetheless allows them to remain in the classicist camp.

The crocheted black kippah can, however, signify very different ideals that are favoured on the opposite side of the religious and political spectrum from the haredim. It is also worn by liberal-to-left-wing Modern Orthodox or people who identify with Young Israel, a group most easily classified by what its members aren't: they aren't haredim and they don't identify with the national religious Zionism of the settlers' movement. They have abandoned the colourful crocheted kippah, with its endless variations of design, because it's been co-opted by the national Zionists.

Israel's nationalist religious Zionist camp is typified by the colourful crocheted kippah. Where many western men once expressed flamboyance with the size and colour of their neckties, Israelis in this group often do so through their head-covering. Endless and intricate variations in colour and design are acceptable here, from geometric patterns to names spelled out, to slogans, logos and wedding or bar mitzvah souvenirs. Orange, the colour symbolizing opposition to the pullout from Gaza in 2005, shone brightly on the heads of this group last summer, with crocheting wives, girlfriends and daughters scarcely able to meet demand.

In general, the larger the kippah the more observant its wearer (although increased size can also indicate increased hair loss). There is no general agreement about the correct size of a kippah. The late American rabbi Moshe Feinstein, renowned for his halachic expertise in, stated that its minimum measure is that "which would be called a head covering." Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual leader of the Shas party in Israel, says it should be large enough to be seen from all sides. So the more observant (Merkaz HaRav) branch of the National Zionist movement, the seedbed of many of Israel's leading religious Zionist rabbis, favours a larger full-headed crocheted kippah. To confuse the issue further, however, many of the rabbis who teach at the movement's yeshivas wear the traditional large black kippa.

A different kind of head covering altogether is found among certain Sephardi communities, particularly those originating from Bukhara and the Caucasus Mountains. Here the tradition is the large, brightly woven, brocade kippah, similar in shape to that worn by North American cantors, minus the peak. In recent years, however, these large colourful caps have also found a market among religious hippies and ecstatic Jews, as well as little boys who have trouble getting smaller kippot to stay on their heads.

Shopping for children's kippot in Israel spoils you for choice. Dozens of Disney and non-Disney characters dance and prance across the smaller-sized head-coverings, digitally imaged, embroidered or painted onto the fabric, or woven into its texture. Train, boats and planes chug their way forever around the rims, and whole kippot represent anything friendly and circular – from the sun to a big smiling face to a cross-section of a watermelon.

And with women in some Jewish streams now taking their place alongside men in shul on the bimah, a whole new market for kippot is opening – as yet underdeveloped, at least in Israel, where kippot thus far have tended to remain masculine.

Perhaps the revolution that's occurred in the way religiously observant Jews cover their heads is reflected in how we refer to their head-coverings. The long-used Yiddish word "yarmulke" probably comes from the Aramaic yiru malka, meaning "awe of the King." It resonates with the religious piety that was once the sole statement made by Jews who covered their heads. The more commonly used term today, however, is kippah, Hebrew for "dome" – a comfortable and non-religiously charged name-tag that allows Jewish head gear to shout out social, political, ideological and fashion statements, as well.

'The Jews were rocking!'

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

The Jewish holidays are almost here, and that means plenty of shul.

I learned so much about prayer from a weekend pulpit exchange with a local Baptist minister years ago. All Friday night his people were praising with calls of "hallelujah" and" right on." While the minister gave his sermon, his people were sitting on the edges of their seats; the fever rose, and they were shouting out all over the place.

But my people were all polite; sitting quietly, nodding in agreement every now and then, puckering their faces when they didn't agree. After a while, his people got the message that Jews don't react in synagogue, so one by one they put down their hands and also listened politely.

On Sunday, it was my turn. As I started my sermon, and the Baptist congregation started to move, I could see my own congregants start to slowly react: "Hallelujah" "amen," and "right on, rabbi!" The Jews were rocking!

What I learned that weekend about the power of prayer has never left me: the willingness to surrender and to hold out that we might be moved; that something big might enter our hearts. I learned about the ability to lose oneself in the moment, to be enveloped by others, to be merged into a greater whole. What Jew would stand up in the middle of a Shabbat service and exclaim, "Baruch HaShem! This is a wonderful service!" I think when Moses said, "Let my people go," he got the words in the wrong order. He really meant, "My people, let go!"

When I asked the minister what time the services would end, he looked at me incredulously and said, "No one has ever asked me that before. They end when we're done."

At the typical bar mitzvah service, people arrive a half hour late, look at their watches through the whole next hour, skip out during the sermon and then come back just in time for the kiddush. We shmooze, we laugh, we chitchat in the seats the whole time before, and often during services. We congregate in the back until the ushers have to prod us to sit down

Now I don't knock the importance of the social aspects of a service. Jews come together on Shabbat and holidays to be with other Jews, and there is something holy about that meeting of Jewish souls. We are a member of a minyan, a quorum; prayer is not a "singular" experience for Jews. There's an old joke in which the rabbi asks Goldberg and Schwartz why they come to services every week. "Rabbi," replies Goldberg, "I come to talk to God, of course." "Rabbi," adds Schwartz, "to tell you the truth, I come to talk to Goldberg." Prayer helps us out of our existential loneliness into a life of relationship.

After the Baptist service, congregants continued to speak spiritually. When I complimented the choir's solo singer on his beautiful voice, the young man replied, "It's a great gift from God." Prayer should humble us; ask us for just one moment to stop being the centre of our own lives and to suspend judgment on others.

The experience of prayer may be in the silences between the prayers; not in the grandiose answers we demand but in the unanswerable questions we ask. Face it: not every service will be uplifting, not every sermon great. Sometimes a service will be just a service. The greatest power of prayer may be its ability to surprise us. The Baptists taught me the gift of surprise, and for that,whenever I step into a synagogue, I am always grateful.

Jewish Life

Making our business dealings holy

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

"Al Chet, For the sin which we have sinned before thee with our commercial dealings, B'masah umatan."

Our urge for money is all powerful, and it's for this reason that there are more mitzvot relating to this particular area – more than 120 – than any other aspect of Torah. At every turn, we are liable to let profit trump piety, and thus we need the word of God to give us the strength to conduct ourselves in the most ethical of ways.

Alas, it appears that even the Divine word may not be good enough. It is often difficult to see the link between ritual observance, acceptance of the Divine authorship of the Bible, and increased meticulousness in our monetary dealings. While we have witnessed much flourishing of almost all things Jewish, it often appears that money matters have, for many, escaped detailed emphasis.

Somehow we have divided the world into secular and religious realms, and business dealings are part of the former. The al chet of our commercial dealings does not refer to any particular sin – any number of these are mentioned individually – but rather to the sin of neglect, a sin of omission not commission. Few, if any, Jewish schools in North America have a course devoted to Jewish business ethics. It's hard to think of any other area of Jewish law that will be of more practical benefit and necessity for living an observant Jewish life. Shabbat, kashrut and holidays, while forming the basis of our Jewish identity, are learned primarily in the home by actually living these experiences with our families. No such daily opportunity exists to observe and absorb proper behaviour in the business world.

In his book Sins in the Marketplace, Dr. Meir Tamari, founder of the Center of Business Ethics and Social Responsibility in Jerusalem, shows how the al chets have as a major theme our failings regarding monetary matters. We have sadly defined Judaism as a series of rituals and beliefs and have not placed enough emphasis on the grand ethical vision of Judaism, on its primary goal of creating a fully functioning society with its economy, social welfare system, military and all other state apparati testifying to our being a "holy nation" and a model for the world at large.

Even the religious political parties in Israel have focused primarily on issues of personal status, leaving so much of the core of Judaism unarticulated. Not only is this a distortion of the essence of Judaism, but it has also caused many non-observant Jews to view Torah as irrelevant to the building of a Jewish state in the modern world. And for this sin of "the desecration of God's name" we must say an additional al chet.

The Hebrew phrase used for our commercial dealings is masah umatan, often translated as "give and take," referring to the nature of business dealings. The literal translation of masah means to lift up, the nasi being the leader of the Jewish people. Matan comes from the root of giving, matana being a gift. Our monetary dealings must be such that they elevate our religious personality. Working is not something we do to just to earn a living, important as that may be. Rather it gives us the opportunity to sanctify the name of God throughout the day.

We elevate ourselves by being giving to others. While we tend to think of business as a profit-making venture for ourselves, the economic theory of capitalism teaches that it is by helping others meet their needs that we enrich ourselves. May the coming year be one in which our masah umatan brings much benefit to all.

Tashlich sites to visit

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On the first afternoon of Rosh Hashanah, Jews gather at nearby streams or bodies of water to perform the ritual of Tashlich. Prayers are recited and sins are symbolically tossed into the depths. Some people even shake out the hems of their clothing while others toss breadcrumbs into the waters. In order to make your outing more meaningful, here are some sites to visit first. (Note: If the first day of Rosh Hashanah falls on Shabbat – as it does this year – Tashlich is postponed to Sunday.)

Tashlich means, "You will cast away," and although the current tradition dates only to the 14th century, the practice is probably based on much earlier verses from the Book of Michah. "God will return and show us mercy, and overcome our missing the mark. And You will cast into the depths of the sea all their errors…" [http://tinyurl.com/jgpvw]

If you don't live near the depths of the sea, you can perform your Tashlich near almost any body of water, preferably one that has fish living in it. [http://tinyurl.com/zonga] Why fish? The Orthodox Union site explains, "Just as fish are protected by the water in which they live, we pray to be protected by God. Also, just as fish swim freely and can suddenly be caught in a net, so, too, we can just as helplessly fall into the net of sin. And even as the eyes of fish are always open, so do we pray that God, too, will keep vigilant watch over his people." [http://tinyurl.com/75nup]

Such philosophic ruminations sound lovely but may be lost on very young kids. In Breadcrumbs and Magic, Amichai Lau-Lavie has written a charming memoir of what it was like when he was a six-year-old and paid his first visit to the "Holy Fish Pond." [http://tinyurl.com/fhgxb] Elsewhere, you can read about the trials and tribulations of a mother whose daughter was quite selective about which sins she threw away at her first Tashlich. [http://tinyurl.com/gzmcn]

Rabbi Hara Person and her family have made Tashlich into a time of peace and forgiveness. Members of her family write down on a piece of paper something they regret doing over the past year. They show each other what they have written, and forgive each other. Then they throw the pieces of paper into a plastic tub filled with water and watch their misdeeds dissolve. "Forgiving and being forgiven enables us as a family to put the last year behind us, to grow, and to enter renewed into the new year." [http://tinyurl.com/n4lwb]

Shelly Frier has a seasonal piece of advice: Take a hike! And then perform the water-related ritual. Although the tradition of Tashlich is most closely associated with Rosh Hashanah, Frier points out that it can be performed until Hoshanah Rabbah, the final day of Sukkot. "So take your family out to water. Picnic by the sea, hike to a stream, or go canoeing if the weather is right. Don't forget your siddur, and a pocket full of crumbs." [http://tinyurl.com/nbvn3] And for real homebodies, just send off a Virtual Tashlich e-mail postcard. [http://tinyurl.com/jvrqk]

Although many sites refer to breadcrumbs being tossed in the water, others explicitly prohibit that practice. Aish.com says, "It is forbidden to feed the fish on yom tov." [http://tinyurl.com/jeyn2] Rabbi Arthur Waskow concurs but for different reasons. Breadcrumbs "increase the organic content of our already endangered waters and thus encourage algae, etc., that use up oxygen. Indeed, one of the major aspects of Tashlich can be [to confront] our misdeeds against the earth and all its winds and waters." [http://www.shalomctr.org/node/441]

So to make everybody happy, let's just toss those crumbs… metaphorically. That gives me the opportunity (once again) to bring back that pun-laden, tongue-in-cheek look at the foods of Tashlich. If you feel using plain old bread lacks subtlety, nuance and religious sensitivity, then consider these alternatives for your various indiscretions: [http://tinyurl.com/cdfq4]

- For sins of indecision: waffles
- For pride: puff pastry
- For auto theft: caraway
- For sycophancy: brownies
- For davening off tune: flatbread

Mideast expert slams media reporting on region

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Middle East analyst Barry Rubin has nothing but disdain for the Western media's reporting on the region he has spent years studying.

"What's the point of reading their reports?" he asks rhetorically. "I feel that the more you read the media, the less you know about the Middle East. There are so many inaccuracies… A lot of the reporters have no special knowledge."

Director of the Global Research in International Affairs Center (GLORIA) and a professor at the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya, Rubin prefers to read Arabic-language papers. As a result, his conclusions about the winners and losers of Israel's war with Hezbollah are somewhat contrarian.

Israel, he said, did not lose the war, though it could have done better and acted quicker. But Hezbollah's crowing about defeating Israel is unsupported by the facts.

Rubin, who was in Toronto last week to address a public gathering at Beth Avraham Joseph Synagogue sponsored by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, pointed to four indicators of Israel's military victory.

- Israel destroyed all of Hezbollah's long-range missiles. Had Hezbollah retained any, the group would have made good on leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah's threat to bomb Tel Aviv, he said.
- Israel stopped the transport of arms and hit arms shipments soon after they left Syria.
- Israel "captured the battlefield," surrounding Hezbollah forces and at war's end were in a position to wipe them out.
- Israel inflicted heavy losses on Hezbollah, perhaps as much as 25 per cent of its fighting force. "Israel's losses were proportionately less," Rubin said.

What's more, the inflicting of casualties (part of Hezbollah's claim to have defeated Israel) has never been considered a determinant of victory. Many countries in past wars suffered much higher casualties than Israel and were still considered victors, he pointed out.

Rubin compared the conflict with Hezbollah to the 1973 Yom Kippur War, which started badly for Israel but ended with Egypt and Syrian forces routed. As in that conflict, Israeli armour suffered at the hands of anti-tank missiles, but Israeli troops adapted to the new situation and prevailed. However, unlike 1973, this war did not end in a clear-cut victory and that may hurt Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, he said.

"Could Israel have done better? Sure. There were shortcomings, particularly in the political leadership," Rubin said.

Fear of high casualties and concern over international criticism restrained Israel from launching a more extensive ground offensive, he said.

The military shortcomings are already being studied and improvements are being implemented, he added.

Rubin, co-author of Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography, said "the story in Lebanon was the worst reported story I've ever seen."

He slammed the western media for accepting uncritically civilian casualty numbers provided by the Lebanese government. Contrary to assertions that more than 1,400 civilians were killed in Israeli attacks, "the bottom line will be that more than 500 Hezbollah soldiers were killed and about 250 Lebanese civilians," he said. Lebanese newspapers, he added, are now reporting 800 casualties in all.

As to the general reporting on the war, he slammed the media for under-reporting stories from Israel and for being taken in by concocted events in Lebanon.

"We have never before faced such a systematic creation of false stories. I feel we'll find the whole Qana [incident] never happened."

Rubin was referring to the south Lebanese village where an alleged Israeli attack supposedly caused a building to collapse, killing scores of civilians. Originally the death toll was put at 54 and later reduced to 28. But Rubin questions even that number.

"I believe the bodies were carted in," he said, noting they appeared to have been washed and showed none of the trauma that would be expected from an explosion and building collapse. As well, he said "green helmet," the Lebanese civilian who directed rescue efforts that revealed the bodies, is in fact a mortician in Tyre.

Another poorly reported story was the gift by Hezbollah of counterfeit money to Lebanese civilians. "It's easy to give people money if you printed it yourself," he quipped, adding that the media could have easily exposed the bogus relief effort had they chosen to.

Turning to the aftermath of the war, Rubin said Arab claims of victory come from a mindset that puts a premium on extracting revenge by inflicting casualties. However, he argued, that has never been a military definition of victory.

Morale in Israel remains high while in Lebanon, polls show many are turning against Hezbollah. Approximately 78 per cent of Druze and Christians oppose the Shiite terrorist group, while 53 per cent of Sunni Muslims are against it.

That drop in support prompted Nasrallah to say he never would have precipitated the crisis had he expected Israel to respond as it did.

As to long-term prospects in the region, Rubin suggested the Arab world was replaying a failed policy that dominated their societies from the 1950s through the 1990s. That process is being advanced by four players: Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas. It began with the Syrian and Palestinian rejection of peace, was strengthened by 9/11 and was once again reinforced by the Lebanon war.

It posits the view that "all problems come from Israel and the West; we must resist; democratic reforms are a trap to weaken us; Israel and the United States are weak, so why compromise if you can win?"

He predicted this view will "dominate for years to come… They will talk big, make threats, refuse peace and keep people incited. But what can they actually do?"

Rubin suggested that "this will lead to 30 to 40 years of total failure for the Arab world."

Ex-terrorist now a pro-Israel advocate

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Walid Shoebat calls himself "just a simple man who wants to speak out."

A former Palestinian terrorist who once threw a bomb into an Israeli bank and almost clubbed an Israeli soldier to death, Shoebat has morphed into an improbable but ardent advocate of Israel for whom "the survival of the Jewish people" is of paramount importance.

He expressed himself in a torrent of words at the Leah Posluns Theatre on Sept. 10 before a responsive audience that responded warmly to his stories and observations.

Walid Shoebat

Describing Israel as "a victim defending itself," Shoebat said in ringing tones that the "best case in history is the case for Israel."

A Muslim convert to evangelical Christianity who found his true calling after reading the Hebrew Bible at the urging of his Mexican Catholic wife, he declared that Jews have "a divine right" to Israel and should be able to live there in peace.

Shoebat – a software engineer whose grandfather was close to the Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini – has been on an astonishing personal journey of rediscovery ever since he repented.

Having discarded his old anti-Semitic views, embraced Israel and reinvented himself as a paid professional speaker, he has been disowned as a traitor by his Palestinian family and friends.

But Shoebat, who was invited here by Aish Toronto, revelled in his new role as he told rambling and sometimes disjointed stories about his checkered past as a terrorist.

He was born in Bethlehem, the son of a prominent Palestinian and an American Christian from northern California.

As a youth, he was taught that Jews are the descendants of monkeys and pigs, that "martyrdom" in defence of the Palestinian cause is to be desired, and that the Holocaust is a myth.

"My teacher told me, 'The Holocaust never existed.'"

He also threw stones at Jews praying at the Western Wall.

After joining the PLO, he tossed a bomb at a building in Bethlehem housing the local branch of Bank Leumi. No one was hurt in the incident.

Shortly afterward, he and other Palestinians pummelled an Israeli soldier in Beit Sahur, a village near Bethlehem.

Briefly jailed by Israel, he moved to the United States upon his release from prison.

Hired as a counsellor by the Arab Student Association, Shoebat continued with his anti-Israel activities.

But after marrying his third wife (his first was Jewish and his second was a Muslim), he delved into the Hebrew Bible and discovered that everything he had been told about Jews was in fact a tissue of lies.

Now, 13 years later, Shoebat is baring his soul and making amends by delivering speeches to Jewish groups.

He offered a number of other comments and recommendations:

- The Day of Judgment for Muslims will come when Israel is surrounded and destroyed.
- Palestinian refugees do not have the right to return to their homes in what is now Israel, nor should Jews go back to their homes in the Arab world.
- The minds of Muslims must be "liberated" from anti-Semitism.
- Peace in the Middle East is impossible as long as it's impregnated with racism and anti-Semitism.
- Do not marry out of your faith.

Jewish refugees from Arab countries can register online

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A new online registration program has been launched by Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC) as part of an International Rights and Redress Campaign that will be launched in November in Jewish communities worldwide.

Stan Urman, the executive director of JJAC, which was founded in 2002, said the campaign is an attempt to bring the rights of Jewish refugees from Arab countries into the international political agenda.

"Clearly, when the world speaks of Middle Eastern refugees, they refer to Palestinians. Less known is the fact that there were more Jews displaced from Arab countries than there were Palestinians, who [both] became refugees as a result of the creation of the State of Israel," Urman said.

According to the American Sephardi Association, a partner of JJAC, discrimination against Jews increased after the creation of Israel in 1948, and Jews living in Arab countries were abused, discriminated against, persecuted and murdered, and their property was seized without compensation.

"We believe that the first injustice was the mass violation [of the rights] of Jews in Arab countries. Today, it would constitute a second injustice to allow the international community to recognize rights of one victim population, Palestinians, without also recognizing rights of another victim population of the very same conflict, Jews who were displaced from Arab countries," Urman said.

Components of the campaign include public education, the documentation of the 2,500-year history of Sephardi Jews who have settled in other countries, and to catalogue their loses, both individual and communal.

Although he is a Montreal-born Ashkenazi, Urman said he devotes his time to this cause because "it's right. It is important for the Jewish people and the State of Israel."

Stan Urman

Last May, JJAC submitted a resolution to the U.S. Congress that would call on government officials to refer to both Palestinian and Jewish refugees when talking about Middle Eastern refugees.

Urman said the resolution may not pass this session in light of the "Jewish community's efforts to ensure strong representation for the needs of the government of Israel in the aftermath of the Lebanese war.

"The timing wasn't the best, because we have to focus our efforts on the needs of Israel and this takes precedent over all resolutions."

Urman added that if it doesn't pass in this congressional session, it will be immediately reintroduced to the next one.

But JJAC's main focus now is the new campaign to register Sephardi Jews who fled Arab countries such as Algeria, Egypt, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Syria, Tunisia, Iran, Iraq and Yemen, more than 50 years ago.

On the organization's website, www.justiceforjews.com, is a form, which is available in English, French, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish and Italian, that asks for personal information and a catalogue of the loss of assets for those who wish to apply for compensation.

"When and if there will be negotiations on rights and compensation for Palestinian refugees, we must be prepared, when necessary, to negotiate for rights and compensation for Jewish refugees. We need the facts," Urman said.

He said that while a number of Canadian Jewish organizations, including B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), are involved in this objective, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is acting as the national contact point.

"We're spearheading this, and we'll be working closely with our colleagues at the Canada Israel Committee, but we will be the central address for the online registration campaign," said Bernie Farber, the executive director of CJC's Ontario region.

"It's an ongoing educational campaign because what we felt was happening here was that the narrative of those Jews who were in Arab countries is being lost. We want to revitalize it, we want to reinvigorate it, and we want to make sure that the world understands that literally tens of thousands of Jews had to leave, mostly in fear of their lives."

Farber explained that CJC will use its website to link to the JJAC website and create awareness of the campaign across the country.

He also hopes to work with Urman to prepare educational packages for both Jewish school and public schools.

"My guess is that people will embrace it because it is an exciting piece of history that a lot of people don't know about. I'm looking forward to getting this going," Farber said.

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Sara R.Horowitz, Director

In a recent workshop on Hebrew poetry, I introduced students to the long history of Jewish poems centering on the Akeda – the binding of Isaac depicted in chapter 22 of Bereshit, or Genesis. We began with a poem written during the Crusades, in which the poet compared Jewish sacrifice in his time to Abraham's sacrifice on Mount Moriah.

Suddenly one student spoke up. "That's not a poem," he objected. "That's a prayer! It's in my Mahzor. It's part of what I davven on the Yamim Nora'im. I can't treat it like a poem!"

He was correct, I confirmed, about the place of the poem in the Mahzor. That poem was a piyyut – a prayer written in the form of poetry. Along with several others on the same theme, it had been incorporated into the liturgy for the High Holidays. Why? First, because it connected with the Rosh Hashanah, second day, Torah reading. Second, because the poem elaborated on central themes of the Yamim Nora'im - seeking Divine mercy and redemption, affirming faith. Third, because the poem resonated with emotions of the High Holidays – anxiety and hope for one's future, and a sense of collective Jewish destiny. And fourth, because the poem provided a model for relating lessons from our tradition to our contemporary situation.

After we read the poem closely, examining its language, its links with other Jewish texts, and its meaning, I asked the student whether he still was troubled by reading this prayer as a poem.

"It's funny," he replied slowly. "Now that I understand how it works as a poem, I think I know what it means. When I davven, I will have real kavanna."

York students come to Jewish studies courses with a wide range of backgrounds and interests. What they find in the courses often surprises them. They come away with their understanding of Judaism and the Jewish experience deepened and enriched, often in ways they didn't anticipate.

"Students come away with their understanding of Judaism and the Jewish experience deepened and enriched, often in ways they didn't anticipate."

Our Centre has a far-reaching mandate. The Centre for Jewish Studies administers the largest university-level program in all of Canada, and one of the four largest outside of Israel. Outstanding scholars and dynamic teachers, our faculty members engage with students in ways that help define and deepen life commitments. We serve as advisors and consultants for projects and institutions important to the Jewish community at home and abroad. Through a wide range of activities on and off campus, the Centre promotes Jewish studies for Jewish and non-Jewish students, develops Jewish teacher education across Canada, and offers stimulating programs for the community. We teach about Judaism, Jewish texts, history, culture, languages and literatures. We owe our success to our faculty, our students – and to our many friends and supporters in the Jewish community.

I invite all of you to become involved in the activities at the Centre. Join us for lectures and cultural events, check out our courses, and help us to grow and develop further.

On behalf of my colleages at the Centre, I wish all of you a fruitful and sweet New Year. Shana Tova.

L.A. Starr set to shine in Toronto

Renowned arts executive to head new and improved Koffler Centre

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

When the Koffler Centre of the Arts began its search for a new executive director, it seemed natural to ask Lori Starr for advice.

After all, Starr, who is considered a visionary by many in the arts community, had previously given valuable insight to Koffler brass about programs and outreach initiatives.

So when she was asked if she could think of anyone who would be a great fit for the new role, Starr gave an obvious choice. Why not hire her?

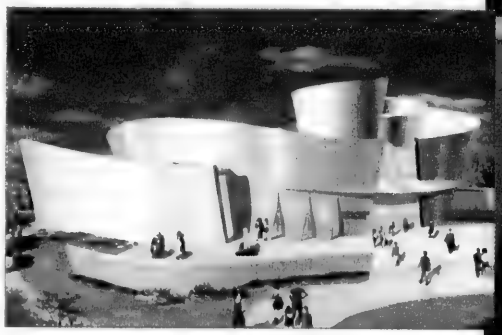
"My whole career has been about my commitment to Jewish life, to arts and to culture and wanting all of those aspects to come together in my work. It was really quite natural for me to come to Toronto," enthuses Starr, who is leaving behind distinguished positions in Los Angeles as the senior vice president of the Skirball Cultural Center and director of the Skirball Museum.

"And when I visited to interview for the position back in May – my first trip to Toronto – I fell in love with the city and all of its dynamism, vibrancy and cultural enterprises."

Starr will begin her duties as the new executive director of the Koffler Centre of the Arts on October 3.

She arrives in the midst of a major transformation of the centre, which will be housed in an entirely redeveloped campus called Central Square, an ambitious project on Bathurst Street, north of Sheppard that is part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Tomorrow Campaign chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum.

In addition to the Koffler Centre, the campus will house the new Prosserman Jewish Community Centre, the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage and the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services.



A rendering of the new and revitalized Koffler Centre of the Arts

Lori Starr

"The new and revitalized Koffler Centre of the Arts on the diverse and vibrant Central Square campus will be a place for creating, teaching, learning, exploring, exhibiting, and socializing," reveals Starr, who holds a master's degree in art history.

"I am thrilled to be part of this extraordinary next step in building the role that Jewish communities can play, through culture, in creating a civil, peaceful, global society."

A consummate professional, Starr has big plans for the centre, which already has a 34-year history of serving as a bastion of cultural activities, ranging from dance, music and visual arts, to hosting schools for various artistic media.

"I would like to see Koffler become the greatest place to study visual arts, dance and music in all of Toronto, if not all of Canada," says the mother of two who is married to sculptor and draftsman Rick Oginz. "I also expect it to be a great place for gathering, a place that touches your mind, body and creative spirit."

Starr has played a pivotal role building other forums for the arts and culture throughout her 25-year career.

In her six years at Skirball, which provides a wide range of exhibitions and educational programs that explore connections between Jewish heritage and American democratic ideals, Starr helped expand its educational and creative content, bolstering the centre's reputation. Its audiences also grew significantly during her years of service.

And prior to Skirball, Starr was a stalwart at the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles which houses European paintings, drawings, sculpture and European and American photographs. She enjoyed 15 years there as the director of public affairs and communications.

These past successes and experiences have engendered quite a buzz at Koffler, where expectations are running high.

"Lori's experience with major cultural institutions in the United States will add tremendously to the Koffler Centre of the Arts," says Tiana Koffler Boyman, president of the Koffler Centre of the Arts. "My expectations are that Lori will expand the diversity of programs and most importantly, increase the usership of the Koffler Centre so that the community, young and old, will benefit from arts education."

Champion of the underdog honoured for community service

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

If ever you were looking for someone who personified the word "mensch," you'd be hard-pressed to find someone who fit that description better than Toronto's own Gordy Wolfe.

The very embodiment of a community leader, Wolfe, in his 22-year role as executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) - a UJA Federation partner agency - has forever raised the bar with his selfless efforts, while championing the cause of our community's most vulnerable. As the consummate volunteer, Wolfe continues today to share his vast experience and knowledge, and his huge heart, to causes both large and small.

Therefore, it was fitting that last week, in front of friends, family, and dignitaries, the downtown offices of JF&CS - housed in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina - were dedicated in Gordy Wolfe's name.

The downtown offices of JF&CS will now be known as the Gordon S. Wolfe branch.

"It has been my privilege to have played a small part in the remarkable history of service to the Jewish community, to help the vulnerable and to go forth and repair the world," Wolfe said at the dedication ceremony at the Nadal JCC. "It is my hope that my name on that door will mean that JF&CS will continue its mission as the champion of those who have no champion," said Wolfe.

Gordy Wolfe

"As executive director of JF&CS for 22 years, Gordy's contributions to the quality of Jewish life in Toronto have been formidable. His impact as a leader in the Jewish community is complemented by his presence as a leader and a citizen of our city, province and country. Gordy has embodied the principle of tikkun olam, to heal the world," said Richard Cummings, executive director of JF&CS.

"I had the honour to work beside Gordy over the past couple of years, and it was a privilege to do so. When I look back at my term as chair of UJA Federation, a number of items will stand out including my friendship with Gordy," said UJA Federation board chair David Engel.

"Above all, to me Gordy Wolfe has always been the icon of what a true communal professional is and can be," said UJA Federation president, Ted Sokolsky. "His dedication to Jewish values and his profound contribution in guiding several generations of communal leaders to make this a great Jewish community continues to inspire everyone who has had the honour and pleasure to work with him. Gordy Wolfe has always led with a generous heart, a razor-sharp intellect and a profoundly Jewish neshama."

Super Week volunteers dedicated to helping northern Israel rebuild

UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign surpasses $50 million

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Close to 400 concerned community volunteers committed to help northern Israel rebuild following its war with Hezbollah came together on September 10 – Super Sunday – to help raise $1.4 million towards UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007.

Another 400 volunteers raised an additional $1.6 million during the subsequent Super Week – Monday to Thursday – for a total of $3 million.

Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 is UJA Federation's regular annual campaign with special emphasis on Israel's emergency needs following the war with Hezbollah.

All gift increases and new gifts will fund urgent social services for northern Israel residents. The campaign will also fund essential local needs, such as substantial assistance for the poor, the vulnerable and Jewish education.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which was the first Federation in the world to initiate an Israel emergency campaign, has now raised more than $50 million, which includes $16 million for the urgent social service needs of northern Israel residents.

Among the essential social services to be funded by the Israel Emergency Campaign are:

- Trauma counselling
- Temporary housing for the uprooted
- Specialized care for the poor, new immigrants, the elderly and individuals with special needs
- Vocational training for the newly unemployed
- Re-equipping damaged community facilities
- A dedicated fund for victims and their families

"The $3 million is definitely a good number, a great start, but we must remember, it's only a start, there is still much work to be done, and so many other community members to contact," said Michael Feldman, chair of Super Sunday. "Super Sunday, and telethons in general are a great way for our community members to get involved in helping those in need in Israel and right here in Toronto, in a real, tangible way. As fantastic as the stalwarts are who volunteer year in and year out, we also need others to get involved."

Lieutenant Tzviel Lemberger

One visitor to Toronto who made his way to Super Sunday was particularly impressed with the efforts of the volunteers.

"Toronto is an example of how the Jewish heart is everywhere, no matter where you are," said Lieutenant Tzviel Lembrger, 23, a tactical naval officer aboard the Israel Defense Forces' (IDF) Lahav ship, which was stationed in Lebanon for over a month before and during the conflict with Hezbollah. "The people here are so warm and caring; I came here to Toronto to see this telethon and I expected to see a couple of guys making phone calls, but there were so many people – men, women and children, who are doing everything they can to help us. I can't tell you how much this means to me and all of our soldiers. The Jewish heart is huge wherever you go."

Sarah Hall

Sarah Hall, 13, who lives in Halifax, came to Toronto for the weekend for the bat mitzvah of her friend. She was staying at the home of Marcy and Leonard Abramsky who asked her if she wanted to work at the telethon, which she did.

"I really liked it," said Hall of her first telethon experience. "I was nervous at first but I was happy to spend my day helping Israel."

Ron Prosserman

Ron Prosserman, a veteran UJA Federation volunteer and community philanthropist, noted a distinct difference in the people he canvassed at Super Sunday this year, as opposed to years past.

"There's some kind of bond, a connection, that is just so special, and so unique, between Toronto's Jewish community and the people of Israel," said Prosserman. "Even people who don't have a lot to give this year are trying to make a difference and are willing to sacrifice to help Israel rebuild."

"The war in Israel has left northern Israel in a shambles," said Richard Bennett, who, with Helen Silverstein, is this year's telethon Chair. "What we're trying to do during Super Sunday and Super Week with all of our wonderful volunteers, and through our Israel Emergency Campaign, is rebuild the country physically, economically and emotionally."

"People I've spoken to are aware of what the needs are in Israel, of the urgency to help these people get their lives back on track and to restore their peace of mind," said Silverstein. "People are being very generous as Jewish Torontonians have always been when Israel is in need."

Northern educators concerned about anxious students

On September 3rd, the Danziger School in Kiryat Shmona – a nothern Israeli community hit by over 1,000 Katyusha rockets during the war with Hezbollah – opened its doors to 1,300 junior and senior high school students – 80% of the city's pupils. Many of these students, traumatized by a month of war, are not the same as they were when they cheerfully started their summer vacation in July. And the school, struck by five Katyusha rockets which damaged 32 of the 48 classrooms, is far from its previous functioning as one of the north's model high schools.

"When the children returned to school, each brought into the classroom his or her own traumas from the summer and we are hopelessly unprepared to deal with this. It's hard to envisage teaching a class of 30 where all the pupils will jump with every slam of a door or wail of an ambulance siren," says Ofer Zafrani, assistant principal and a former student. According to Zafrani, a person with post traumatic stress syndrome suffers from symptoms such as insomnia, nightmares, anxiety, flashbacks, irritability and depression.

It is the possibility of these symptoms in the students that concerns northern educators.

"We are simply ill-equipped to cope with 1,300 anxiety-ridden students, and we are in desperate need of professional help for our children. With no finances for art therapy, psychodrama or any other positive enrichment activities it is difficult for us to help the children come to terms with their trauma and start the healing process."

The Danziger School in Kiryat Shmona was damaged during the recent war with Hezbollah. (Photos by Sharon Schwartzman, UJA Federations Canada)

Before the war ended, the Jewish Agency for Israel – with financial assistance from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – moved to action to develop a comprehensive plan for rebuilding the shattered northern region. The plan includes A New Tomorrow, a wide-ranging program for school children to move from trauma to recovery through reintegration into the formal and informal education system.

For schools such as Danziger, A New Tomorrow offers afternoon enrichment programs, tutoring for children falling behind in their studies and values education. It also brings together a network of partners, including volunteers and professionals.

At the Danziger school there are hundreds of students who have embarked on their most important school year, as their matriculation exams, which students must pass for university admission, begin in January.

Caregiver honoured by NHL Alumni Association

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

James Harris has a passion for hockey. But he never imagined that the NHL Alumni Association would be honouring him for his strength and determination in life at the fifth annual NHL Alumni Awards gala dinner on Sept. 7.

James, 78, received the Ace Bailey Award of Courage for the unwavering support and care he has shown for his wife, Fay, since she was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease in December 1997 at the age of 67.

The Ace Bailey Award is named in honour of former NHL player Garnet "Ace" Bailey who was killed in the Sept. 11 tragedy when his plane hit the World Trade Center. The award is presented to a patient of the Baycrest Foundation who displays courage and compassion every day of their life and who does so with dignity, class and good spirit.

Mark Gryfe, president of the Baycrest Foundation, was approached by the NHL Alumni Association to choose the award recipient. The relationship between Baycrest and the NHL Alumni developed last year through a recreational hockey tournament in support of Alzheimer's research at Baycrest.

It didn't take Gryfe long to realize that James was the most deserving. "What makes James so unique and truly courageous is the fact that in 1999, while still caring for his wife at home, James, too, was diagnosed with Alzheimer's," Gryfe said at the gala dinner.

> 'What makes James so unique and truly courageous is the fact that in 1999, while still caring for his wife at home, James, too, was diagnosed with Alzheimer's'

Caring for an Alzheimer's patient is an emotionally draining task, "but this devoted husband has never let his own condition deter him from caring for Fay," he said.

In December 2002, Fay moved to Baycrest. But James remained committed to his wife. He sold his family home so he could be closer to her, and since her admittance to Baycrest, James has visited her almost every day, Gryfe said.

"She can't talk, she can't walk, she can't do anything without help, but she's my wife," James said.

He admits that it is a difficult and unhappy situation, but he refuses to give in. "I keep going for my wife," James said.

"The award was for my wife and family. I am absolutely delighted," he added.

Julia Rosenthal, James' daughter, remembers the excitement in her father's voice when he told her about the award.

"He had trouble conveying it to me due to the Alzheimer's disease, but I could tell he was thrilled about it. He was very excited and he had a big smile on his face when he heard about the award," Rosenthal said. "I really think he deserves it."

James also expressed his excitement to Fay during a visit on Sept. 6, the day before the gala. "My mother doesn't understand anything, but he wanted to share it with her. He talks to her all the time," Rosenthal said.

For now, James' memory of the NHL Alumni dinner is vivid.

"It made me very happy, it was something I really enjoyed," said the lifelong hockey fan.

Despite suffering from Alzheimer's, James' love for hockey has not faltered. He enjoys watching his three grandsons, Clayton, 12, Jeremy, 10, and Grant, 9, play hockey.

"I really enjoy hockey, but I'm not an expert," he said.

COR announces senior appointments

The Kashruth Council of Canada has made two senior appointments that it says will help it meet the growing demand for, and increasing complexity of, kosher certification services.

Rabbi Yacov Felder has been named vice-chair of the council's Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, the board of rabbis that oversees kashrut policy and supervision. Rabbi Felder, whose late father, Rabbi Gedalia Felder, was founding chair of the Vaad, will assist current Vaad chair Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner and will be involved in a full range of responsibilities related to kashrut policy and supervision.

Rabbi Felder also serves as spiritual leader of Shomrei Shabbos Chevra Mishnayos Congregation in Toronto.

In addition, Rabbi Sholom Hersh Adler has been named to the newly created position of executive rabbinic co-ordinator and will oversee all kosher supervision. Rabbi Adler brings more than 20 years of experience to the position, having served with many major kashrut organizations, including the Orthodox Union and B'datz. He has extensive experience in establishing and maintaining sophisticated kashrut standards, the Toronto-based Kashruth Council said in a statement.

Rabbi Felder named vice-chair of the Vaad

The council, known as COR, is comprised of two governing bodies. The first is the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth, and the second is a lay board of directors that provides organizational oversight and leadership.

"With the leadership of these two superbly qualified individuals, we will enhance COR's ability to fulfil its mandate," Rabbi Kerzner said. "We will be able to achieve superior kashrut standards and properly provide for the needs of all consumers of kosher products."

Rabbi Mordechai Levin will continue in his present job as COR's executive director.

Working with Rabbi Levin, rabbis Felder and Adler will help "formalize kashrut standards and policies," COR said.

They will also examine staffing structure and complement that will be necessary to support the organization's anticipated growth, in order to meet current and future demands.

COR said the past 10 years have seen tremendous growth in the availability of kosher products. COR now supervises more than 800 food processing plants and food providers. In addition, its COR certification appears on more than 45,000 products and services, the organization said.

"These new appointments will ensure our ability to respond to and stay ahead of this rapid growth," said Meyer Feldman, lay chairman of the Kashruth Council. "Documented market trends indicate that consumer interest in kosher products is growing, and COR is committed to supporting both consumers and providers of kosher products."

Recent war tested Israel's national will: journalist

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

If something positive can be derived from the Israeli-Hezbollah war, it is that discussion has been raised around what it means to be Jewish both in Israel and the Diaspora, said Jonathan Rosenblum, Jerusalem Post columnist and director of Jewish Media Resources.

But Israel and its people can never be a "normal society," because "we are Jews in a hostile Arab world that will not let us forget that we are Jews," said Rosenblum, speaking at Congregation B'nai Torah on Sept. 10.

Jonathan Rosenblum

On June 9, 2005, then-deputy prime minister Ehud Olmert told a meeting of the left-wing American Israel Policy Forum: "We are tired of fighting, we are tired of being courageous, we are tired of winning, we are tired of defeating our enemies." Responding to that, Rosenblum told the B'nai Torah congregation, "We cannot afford to be tired.

Olmert wanted a fun society, but we cannot be fun," Rosenblum said. "We are people with a mission – it's the reason we return to that sliver of land. It's not just surviving, it is surviving with a purpose."

To survive with a purpose means remaining connected to the laws that make us Jewish. It is vital to promote and maintain national will, he said.

'We are people with a mission — it's the reason we return to that sliver of land'

The Israeli-Hezbollah war tested that national will, and "Israel showed that it was not going to be swept away."

After Hezbollah attacked Israeli towns and troops on July 12, thousands of Israeli civilians were displaced. But at no time did the civilians from the north put pressure on their government to bring the fighting to a halt, Rosenblum said.

Instead, segments of the Israeli population responded by arranging private relief organizations. "All over the place, schools were turned into dormitories. It was an overwhelming and inspiring response to the needs of the Jewish people," he said.

"The Israeli population is not about throwing in the towel," he added.

Rosenblum spoke of an Israeli soldier who flung his body onto a grenade in order to protect his troops. Just before it detonated, the soldier was heard reciting the Shema, an affirmation of Judaism.

"On an individual basis the soldiers fought with tremendous courage," he said.

But despite the positive elements that were derived from the war, Rosenblum was quick to point out some negatives.

Olmert said Israel would wipe out Hezbollah and destroy its ability to hit Israel with rockets. "This was not successful," Rosenblum said.

Israel's initial reliance on air strikes was a failure, and from there the country pursued ground attacks, but Hezbollah was prepared for them, he said. It knew Israeli tanks were not capable of manoeuvring through the hilly terrain of Lebanon and so its fighters were successful in killing Israeli soldiers.

After examining the decisions surrounding the war, "it is impossible to understand what military strategy Israel was pursuing," Rosenblum said.

He also criticized the decision to use air strikes to avoid losing Israeli soldiers, because it came at the expense of Israeli civilian lives.

"The role of the Israeli military is to protect civilians. But during the war we became so concerned with casualties that we turned our focus to soldiers without thinking about the long-term repercussions," he said.

"The army is for protection, not to protect. We became a country unable to make decisions beyond the immediate," he added.

However, Rosenblum believes there is still hope. "If we can learn from our failings, then we might find ourselves in a better situation in the future."

91-year-old volunteers on Israeli army base

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Leo Goodman, a Thornhill retiree who returned earlier this month from a 16-day trip to Israel as a volunteer, jokes that he will be the "pin-up boy" of the international Sar-El program.

The energetic 91-year-old, whose looks and bearing belie his age, didn't take any pictures on his recent trip, but his fellow volunteers all wanted to take one of him, he said last week in an interview.

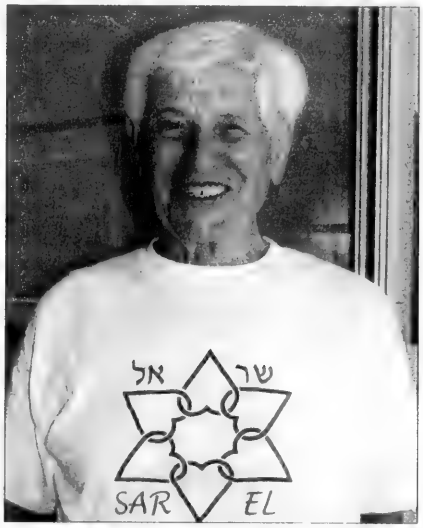
A fitness buff who keeps in shape with weights, a rowing machine and hitting a raquetball around for 30 to 40 minutes at a time – not to mention regular walks during which he often goes over the multiplication tables to occupy his mind – Goodman made time to speak to The CJN in between a condominium board meeting and a poker game.

The twice-widowed father of two, grandfather of four, and great-grandfather of "4.5" (one grandchild is on the way) travelled to Israel with Sar-El Canada (also known as Canadian Volunteers for Israel) after passing a medical exam. He spent most of his time on an army base near Tel Aviv sorting, counting and packing medical supplies seven hours a day.

On his weekends off, Goodman travelled to Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, where he felt right at home in the open air markets, because they reminded him of his younger years in Toronto's Kensington area.

He says if he can be of help, he will, explaining not only his Sar-El stint but why he assisted another volunteer by carrying his luggage.

The trip marked Goodman's first time volunteering for Sar-El, "but not the last," he said, adding that he plans to return next year. The volunteers, he said, were "just beautiful, caring people."



Leo Goodman

Goodman – who travels "every chance I get" and was last in Israel in 1998 – applied to the program in May. He was not dissuaded by events this summer, joking that he would go and "stop the war.

"I like to have fun," he said. "I like to laugh."

Describing himself as the former "Turkey King of Canada," Goodman lived for many years in London, Ont., raising turkeys and tending to his company, Riverside Poultry, the largest of its kind in Canada, in nearby Strathroy. In London, he served as treasurer of Congregation Or Shalom for 13 years.

After Goodman sold his share of the business in the 1970s, he and his late wife Kay moved to Toronto to be closer to their children, and he became a mortgage broker. "I had to do something," he said.

He got his start in the poultry business as a chicken peddler from 1935 to 1942. He then entered the Royal Canadian Air Force, where he served as an air engine mechanic on this side of the ocean.

A Russian immigrant who came to Canada at age nine with his widowed mother and five older siblings, Goodman left high school as a teenager after a year at Central Technical School. His mother had a fruit store on Kensington Avenue, established with a $300 loan from a Jewish organization.

Delivering chicken on his bicycle, Goodman earned a nickel for every trip below St. Clair Avenue, and a dime when he travelled north of it.

"Things were tough," he said, but he "was always laughing.

"I'm one of the luckiest people in the world, and I don't know why," he said. "I enjoy life."

Hebrew U to honour full-time volunteer

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) in Jerusalem is getting set to honour a woman who has made tremendous contributions to the Jewish community, both locally and abroad.

Barbara Bank, a philanthropist who has been a full-time volunteer for the local and international Jewish community for more than 25 years, is finally getting the recognition she deserves, said Barbara Frances, project co-ordinator for CFHU.

CFHU will present Bank, who is on the board of the organization, with a person of distinction award at a tribute fundraising dinner in her honour, planned for her colleagues and friends on Nov. 21 at Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto.

Barbara Bank

"People keep calling and saying it's about time someone recognized her work in the community... [They] say, 'I want to be involved,' because she is very understated, and people who work with her say, even though she has tremendous means, she is very humble. People like working with her and she is very passionate about what she does," Frances said.

"Barbara is a woman who has been working in the community for the past 25 years, and she gets personally involved in six to 10 projects a year and supports philanthropically another 10 to 20 projects."

Among her many commitments, Bank is the chair of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) of UIA Federations Canada. She is also actively involved in the Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital, the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

But according to Frances, Bank now has a particular interest in providing assistance to female Ethiopian immigrants in Israel.

All of the proceeds from the tribute fundraising dinner in November will go towards scholarships for the Mechina program in Israel.

Mechina is a preparatory, one-year program designed for newcomers, foreign students and high school graduates who are not eligible for registration in university.

The goals of Mechina are to help students attain the level of knowledge required for university admission, to prepare students for university-level courses by developing their cognitive and learning skills, and to teach students to speak Hebrew well enough to comprehend lectures and write term papers in Hebrew.

"So what it does is take someone like an Ethiopian woman who hasn't had a proper high school education and gets her prepared for university," Frances said, adding that the goal is to raise about $100,000 for the program.

Last year, Bank wrote an entry in the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Book of Life and painted the picture of a woman who wants other Jews to share the same passion for Jewish life that she does.

"I knew from my own experiences how easy it is to lose the connection to Jewish life. Raised with little Jewish tradition in my home and in a predominantly non-Jewish suburb of Boston, I did not have a strong affiliation with the Jewish community and nearly missed out on all the gifts that Jewish life has to offer," Bank wrote.

After attending school in Toronto and marrying a son of Holocaust survivors, she became more engaged in Jewish life and the community.

Bank said she was inspired by the work of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and began volunteering, taking trips to Israel, and eventually became the chair of the Women's Campaign and Advocacy, March of the Living and NJCL.

"I am proud of being Jewish. I am grateful that I found the Jewish community. It has been a privilege to give back, and while I know I am doing my best to contribute today, I've often wondered what will be available for tomorrow. Endowments helped me answer that question."

It is because of this undying passion for maintaining thriving Jewish communities all over the world that CFHU has decided to honour her.

"I'm totally in awe of her continuing commitment," Frances said.

Following the dinner, a lecture by New York Times bestselling author Deborah Tannen, which is also being held at Adath Israel and is scheduled for 8 p.m., will be open to the community.

Tannen is the author of You Just Don't Understand, That's Not What I Meant! and her most recent book, You're Wearing That? Understanding Mothers and Daughters in Conversation.

She is also a professor of linguistics at Georgetown University and has appeared on television shows including The Oprah Winfrey Show, Good Morning America and 20/20.

Proceeds from the lecture will go to Women's Studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Not many observant Jews live in Varna, Bulgaria

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Feature

It might sound like the start of a clichéd joke: "two Jews walk into a casino in Bulgaria." But Gill and Marc Ginsburg would tell you such a thing exists there. The Toronto couple just came back from a year in Bulgaria, where they saw, among many fascinating things, hundreds of Israelis visit the eastern European country for its variety of "one-armed bandits."

While Marc attended the medical university in Varna, Bulgaria, the couple had a unique opportunity to see the small and little-known country and enjoy its Jewish community, which has members who seem to have come out of another century.

"There are still horse-drawn carriages here, or donkey-drawn. Here and there we see one in the city, but there are loads in the little villages. It's so funny to see a donkey-drawn carriage next to a BMW," Gill says.

Bulgaria, about 1½ times the size of Nova Scotia, borders Romania, Turkey, Greece and Serbia. Even though the language of instruction for Marc's program is English, the lingua franca of the country is Bulgarian. "We thought more people would speak English here, but that's not the case. Some of the younger generation can speak English," Gill says.

Married three years, the couple had their first child, Yosef Chaim, in Bulgaria, eight months ago. Their mere presence in Varna upped the Jewish population by more than one per cent.

There are about 200 Jews in Varna and about 1,200 in Sofia, the capital, a six-hour drive away, Gill says.

"The older generation is more traditional, and they go to the Friday services and get together on the holidays. The young generation is secular, and unfortunately intermarriage is a big problem here."

There used to be two synagogues in Varna, but now the couple says there's just a Jewish community centre, where Friday afternoon services are held in the summer, in Bulgarian.

They believe they were the only observant Jews in Varna, and kashrut often became an involved and precarious ordeal.

The Chabad rabbi in Sofia orders kosher food every couple of months from Israel, and the Ginsburgs joined in with a list of their needs, mainly meat, cheese and wine. Rabbi Yosef Salamon from Chabad there has even started shchitah (the kosher ritual slaughter of animals) – something which has not been practised in Bulgaria since before World War II. "Three kosher Bulgarian chickens arrived in Varna by bus from Sofia. Extremely fresh," Gill says.

The Jewish population mushrooms during the summer and fall. About 800 Israelis came for Rosh Hashanah services last year.

"During peak tourist season there are many Israelis who vacation in Bulgaria. It's because it's just over two hour's flight from Tel Aviv, and they come for the casinos," Marc says.

The Havana Hotel, where the Ginsburgs stayed for the High Holy Days, is "completely Israeli," with hotel signs in Hebrew.

Though frequently given to gambling when they arrive in Zlatni Pyasatsi (Golden Sands Resort), the Israeli tourists also frequent Chabad, whether just to shmooze, say Kaddish, or even just have a coffee.

"It was amazing having Chabad there… helping to maintain many of the traditions and fill in gaps in local Jewish education and practices in Varna as well as Plovdiv," Marc says.

"The Chabad rav and his family would drive across the country from Sofia to Varna when even one Jew in town had a concern or religious need."

For Yosi's bris, Rabbi Salamon arranged for a mohel within a day while he was visiting New York. By the next morning, Rabbi Salamon and Rabbi Lerner had met in Sofia, taken a six-hour bus ride to Varna, and both arrived at the Ginsburg's home at 6 a.m., ready for morning prayers and the bris.

Gill and Marc Ginsburg and their son, Yosi, lived in Varna, Bulgaria, while Marc attended the medical university there.

The Ginsburgs visited Jewish landmarks in Bulgaria. In the winter they drove to a mikvah at author and rabbinic scholar Rabbi Eliezer Papo's grave site.

"It was also amazing as that mikvah was also right at the bank of the Danube River, between Bulgaria and Romania. During the warmer spring and summer, the Black Sea, near the natural springs, was a great place to use as a mikvah. Even the sand there was really soft, and you could walk out really far into the sea before it got deep," Gill says.

Anti-Semitism in the country is almost non-existent. "It seems pretty safe in Varna," she says. "Traditionally Bulgaria has been really good to its Jews."

Although during World War II Bulgaria aligned itself with Germany, the country thwarted orders to send its 50,000 Jews to death camps, and church leaders were known to have stood up for their Jewish neighbours. The worst anti-Semitic problem Gill has heard of happened in Sofia just after last Shavuot, when four men assaulted the Chabad security guard.

Marc has now completed his first year of school in Varna, with plans to transfer for the second year to Sint Eustatius, one of the islands making up the Netherlands Antilles.

"We're looking forward to the adventure of moving to a new place, establishing our Jewish home, meeting new people and," Marc says, "interacting with the Chabad in the Caribbean."

Philanthropy has extended to Sunnybrook, York

Mining Corporation. In 2000, he became a member the Order of Canada for his philanthropy.

He maintained a relatively low profile until the mid-1990s, when he donated an initial $15 million to York University for the Schulich School of Business, formerly known as the faculty of administrative studies. He later donated $7 million toward the school's new building.

"I was 55 years old, one of the richest guys in the country, and no one knew who I was," he said. "I drive a 12-year-old car, I've been married 38 years, I live in a 30-year-old house.

"If I don't watch it, I'm going to be the richest guy in the graveyard," he remembers thinking.

Much of his philanthropy – which extends beyond education to other sectors, most notably his donation to the Schulich Heart Centre at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre – is based on wanting "to do some things that help kids," he said. "Society depends on the productivity of healthy kids."

The father of two and grandfather of two – "they're my true wealth," he says – is "big on scholarships." By the end of this year, he will have endowed 650 of them.

"A keynote of everything I've done is to promote accessibility" for students who otherwise might find it difficult or impossible to pursue higher education, he said.

The scholarship he received in his own student days was "probably the most important $1,600 of my life," he says now. By investing the money, he was able to fund his MBA as well as three months of travel to 13 countries, including a 2½-week stint in Israel. He visited Israel again on a family trip in 1985, and plans to return in the next year.

Schulich's Technion gift will include scholarships, visits by "renowned scholars," upgrading of infrastructure, and teaching awards.

The latter is a hallmark of his educational philanthropy, the result of his experience as a student with a number of professors who "couldn't teach."

With previous donations of $26 million and $25 million respectively for the (now eponymous) University of Western Ontario's school of medicine and dentistry and the University of Calgary's faculty of engineering, Schulich said one of the best things he did was to sit down with students, "kick the staff out of the room," and ask the students what they needed.

Currently, Schulich – who got in the habit of reading a book a week as an eight-year-old child – is writing a book aimed at sharing his life lessons with 20- to 40-year-olds. He expects it to be out next spring.

Kolel moves to BJCC

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After six years on Eglinton Avenue near Yonge Street, Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, has opened its doors at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Kolel's director, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, said it has sold its Eglinton Avenue building and is now holding classes at the BJCC.

Speaking from Kolel's new home on the ground floor of the BJCC right next to Second Cup, Rabbi Goldstein said she is "tremendously excited about the opportunities that our coming together present.

"With this partnership, we will be able to add more courses and broaden our appeal, while we continue our mission of outreach work with a team of dedicated Jewish professionals whose programs positively affect hundreds of Jewish lives."

Kolel has always conducted High Holy Day services at the BJCC, she said, "and we've always felt comfortable here."

As well, she said, Gail Gould, the BJCC's assistant executive director, is a former Kolel executive director, "so there is a strong connection."

When Kolel started up in 1991, Rabbi Goldstein said, it rented space in a strip mall on Steeles Avenue. "We held classes in libraries, at Hillel, in people's boardrooms – the idea was to bring Jewish education to them."

Kolel then moved to Leo Baeck Day School, and finally to Eglinton Avenue, where it held all its classes.

"The building was great, but we began to feel it was limiting us. We weren't reaching students in the north end of the city. Little by little, the grassroots was getting lost because we were so tied to Eglinton Avenue," she said.

"Now, we're able to be everywhere. We're also holding classes at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, and the Family Resource Centre in the Promenade Mall. We can expand our programming because we have three locations."

Kolel may no longer have its own building, Rabbi Goldstein said, "but our outreach is larger. We have a central spot in the main lobby and lots of people see us. We're trying to start up a drop-in class, so people can work out in the gym and then attend a class.

"With so many people coming to the building we can expand our clientele. We can cater to young mothers, seniors, all kinds of people. We can have our finger in all the pots."

Kolel is now a department of the BJCC, she said, "but we have retained our name, our philosophy, our mission and our website.

"Our purpose is to provide the highest quality adult education which is pluralistic in nature. We are non-judgmental and there is no agenda as to what type of Jew students should be at the end."

They believe in the secular philosophy of transformational education, she says. "We think adults who take our classes are best equipped to decide how they will live out the knowledge. We have no agenda. Kolel teachers come from across the spectrum of Judaism."

BJCC executive director Sherry Kulman said Kolel has been warmly welcomed into the BJCC family. "Our partnership will further our ongoing mission to enhance Jewish life and learning."

STANDING WITH ISRAEL

AHS Unites With Israel brought more than 1,500 students from Associated Hebrew Schools together to show their solidarity with the Jewish state and to launch the school's Israel-based activities for the year. The program included Israeli songs, presentations from agencies dealing with children in Israel's north, and a drumming presentation. It culminated in the releasing of doves, representing students' prayers for peace in Israel.

Holiday Food Ideas

New ways to use apples and honey

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

I remember once being interviewed about Rosh Hashanah desserts. The interviewer (a friend of mine as it happened) asked, "What is there beyond apples and honey?"

To which I solemnly replied that there is no beyond apples and honey!

Luckily for us, however, those two ingredients open up a whole world of sweet possibilities. Some of the ones found below contain both ingredients, some only call for one, but whatever the case, they are reason to celebrate and to ensure a sweet new year.

ALMOND CHEESECAKE APPLE BARS

These bars are perfect for lunch during the holiday when a cake may be too much of a good thing. Be sure to toast the nuts to provide a contrasting colour.

Crust
¼ cup unsalted butter or margarine, softened
¼ cup cream cheese, softened
⅓ cup granulated sugar, divided
⅓ cup packed brown sugar, divided
1⅓ cups all purpose flour, divided
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup coarsely chopped toasted skinned almonds, divided

Filling
½ cup cream cheese, softened
½ cup granulated sugar
1 egg
2 tsp. finely grated lemon rind
1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 northern spy or golden delicious apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced

Using electric beaters, beat butter with cream cheese and ¼ cup each of the granulated and brown sugars until light and fluffy. In separate bowl, combine 1¼ cups of the flour and salt. Using wooden spoon, stir flour mixture into butter mixture. Stir in ¼ cup of the almonds. Transfer ⅔ cup of this mixture to another bowl. Press remaining dough into 8-in. parchment paper-lined baking pan. Prick all over with a fork.

Bake in centre of preheated 350-degree oven for 18 to 20 minutes or until crust is golden.

Meanwhile, add remaining flour, granulated and brown sugar to the reserved flour mixture, until crumbly. Set aside.

Using electric beaters, beat cream cheese with sugar until light, scraping bowl as necessary. Beat in egg. Beat in lemon rind and juice.

Not just an apple a day anymore

Arrange apple slices over prepared crust in single layer. Pour cream cheese mixture evenly over top. Sprinkle crumb mixture over top. Sprinkle with remaining almonds.

Bake in centre of oven for 45 to 50 minutes or until topping and almonds are a light golden colour. Makes 20 small squares.

CINNAMON APPLE SOUR CREAM COFFEE CAKE

This dairy-based cake is perfect for Rosh Hashanah, with its apple filling and ultra moist crumb topping.

Filling
¼ cup packed light brown sugar
¼ cup granulated sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
4 apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced

Cake
1 cup unsalted butter, softened
½ cup cream cheese, softened
2½ cups granulated sugar
6 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
3 cups all purpose flour
¼ tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup sour cream

In bowl, gently toss together brown and granulated sugars, cinnamon and apple slices; set aside.

Using electric beaters, beat together butter and cream cheese until well combined. Gradually add sugar; beat until light and fluffy. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Beat in vanilla.

In separate bowl, combine flour, baking soda and cinnamon. Using wooden spoon, stir flour mixture into butter mixture alternately with sour cream, making 3 additions of dry ingredients and 2 of sour cream.

Spread one-third of batter into well-greased 10-in. tube pan. Layer with half of apple mixture. Spread another third of batter over; top with remaining apple slices. Spread remaining batter over top.

Bake in centre of preheated oven at 325 for about 1 hour and 20 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan on rack for 20 minutes. Invert to cool completely. Makes 16 to 20 servings.

BAKED APPLES WITH CARAMEL NUT TOPPING

As a change of pace from the usual cakes, apples or honey, why not try baked apples with a gooey, rich caramel sauce. For utmost appeal, use a combination of pecans, macadamia nuts and pecans.

1 cup apple juice
½ cup honey
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
3 tbsp. butter or margarine
8 tart baking apples

Topping:
25 vanilla flavoured caramels
¼ cup whipping cream or non-dairy substitute
½ tsp. vanilla
pinch salt
½ cup mixed chopped toasted nuts

In small saucepan, combine apple juice, honey, lemon juice and butter; bring to boil. Reduce heat and boil gently for 10 minutes or until thickened.

Meanwhile, core apples almost to bottom, leaving base intact. Using small paring knife, cut off 1-inch-wide strip at top. Place in 11 x 7-in. rectangular baking dish.

Pour juice mixture over apples. Cover and bake in centre of preheated 375-degree oven for about 45 minutes or until tender, basting a few times. Let cool slightly.

In saucepan, melt caramels and whipping cream together, stirring often, until smooth. Stir in vanilla. Let cool slightly.

To serve, place apple on small dessert plate. Drizzle about 2 tbsp. of caramel sauce over apple; sprinkle with nuts. Makes 8 servings.

APPLE CRANBERRY STRUDEL

3 apples, peeled, cored and sliced
¼ cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. finely grated orange rind
1 cup cranberries, fresh or frozen
¼ cup ground almonds or dried breadcrumbs
½ cup melted butter or margarine
8 sheets phyllo dough

In large bowl, gently toss together apple slices, ½ cup of sugar, orange rind and cranberries; set aside.

In separate small bowl, combine almonds and remaining ¼ cup of sugar.

Keeping remaining phyllo covered with plastic wrap and then a towel, place 1 piece of phyllo on work surface. Brush lightly with butter. Sprinkle with 2 tbsp. of almond mixture. Repeat layering 6 more times, buttering and sprinkling with almond mixture. Top with last piece of phyllo; brush with butter. Spoon filling down one long side of phyllo, leaving 2-in. at each of the three sides. Fold short sides over filling. Gently roll up strudel.

Transfer to parchment paper-lined baking sheet. Brush all over with butter. Using sharp knife but without cutting through to filling, score top of strudel into 6 or 8 equal sized pieces. (Strudel can be lightly covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 8 hours.)

Bake in centre of preheated oven at 375 for 40 to 45 minutes or until golden brown. Cool; serve warm or at room temperature, slicing where original cuts were made. Makes 8 servings.

Different cultures, similar traditions

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Chinese cooking has always been one of my favourites. I studied Chinese cooking with a Chinese teacher and then taught it for many years.

I was recently reading an article written by my cyber-friend Sonia Martinez from Hawaii about the Chinese New Year. As I read Sonia's article, I could not help but notice many similarities between Chinese New Year traditions and Jewish New Year traditions.

The Chinese New Year is determined by the lunar calendar, as is the Jewish New Year. On the first night of the Chinese New Year, families traditionally eat together, as do Jewish families on Rosh Hashanah.

Many of the foods eaten are filled with symbolism. Sound familiar? A major difference is that the Chinese symbolic foods represent the wish for wealth and prosperity. The foods that Jews serve on Rosh Hashanah are used to express wishes for a sweet year, increased merits, fertility and destruction of our enemies, as well as wealth and prosperity.

Chinese tables are loaded with more food than could possibly be eaten in the hope for wealth and abundance for the year that is beginning. Many dishes are similar in both cultures. Fish is eaten by the Chinese to ensure long life and good fortune. We Jews eat fish as a symbol asking that we be fruitful and multiply like fish. Red dates bring the hope for prosperity for them. We eat dates as a symbol that our enemies be consumed. Long noodles, which represent long life, are always served on the Chinese table, but never cut or chopped. Many Jews traditionally serve noodle kugels.

Spring rolls represent wealth. Lettuce-wrapped lucky foods are especially fortuitous, since lettuce represents paper money and the Cantonese word for lettuce sounds like "rising fortune."

The Far East can come to your table

The word for fish, yu sounds like yue, which represents abundance. A whole fish, especially a freshwater carp, whose name, li, also symbolizes profit, is served from head to tail, as well as a whole chicken symbolizing a great beginning and end to the New Year.

Oranges and tangerines are also served, because the Chinese words for these fruits symbolize wealth and good fortune. The Chinese word for pomelo sounds like their symbol for "to have," and thus these are also served.

Knives are considered weapons and are not to be placed on the dining table. Many Jews remove all knives from the table before reciting the Birkat Hamazon (Grace after meals) for the same reason.

CARP WITH TANGERINE SAUCE

Fish and tangerine, two of the ingredients considered lucky by the Chinese, are combined in one dish for an auspicious beginning. This dish, based on my friend Sonia's recipe, can be doubled or tripled and would make a delicious first course for Shabbat dinner. If you can't find black bean sauce with a proper hechsher, you can omit it from the recipe.

½ the peel of small tangerine
3 lb. whole carp, cleaned and scaled – snapper may be used instead
2 tsp. salt
4 tbsp. cornstarch
2 cups sesame oil
2½ tbsp. chopped garlic
3½ tbsp. dry white wine or sherry
1 tbsp. black bean sauce
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. white sugar
6 tbsp. vegetable stock or pareve chicken stock

Scrub the tangerine, then peel. Soak the peel in warm water for 20 minutes or until soft. Drain then rinse under running water. Squeeze out extra liquid. Chop the peel and set aside.

Make 3 or 4 slashes on either side of the fish and rub the fish with salt. Sprinkle the fish on both sides with cornstarch.

Heat oil in a frying pan or wok. When the oil is hot, deep-fry the fish on both sides for about 4 to 6 minutes; both sides of the fish should be browned. Remove the fish from the pan and let it drain on several layers of paper towels.

Leave only 2 tbsp. of the oil in the pan or wok. Bring oil back to a high heat, mix in the tangerine peel and garlic. Stir-fry for 30 seconds. Add sherry, bean sauce, soy sauce, sugar and stock. Mix well, then add the fish to the mixture. Cover and cook for 8 minutes. Serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

CHINESE CHICKEN WINGS

Make these once and your family will forever nag you to make them again. The longer you marinate the wings the tastier they'll be.

20 chicken wings
oil for deep frying

Marinade
1 tsp. 5-spice powder
1-2 cloves garlic, minced
1½ tsp. salt
1 tbsp. ginger, finely minced

Coating Mixture
⅓ cup flour
⅓ cup cornstarch
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ tsp. paprika
¼ tsp. 5-spice powder

Separate chicken wings into thirds and discard wing tips. Place in mixing bowl or zip-lock plastic bag. Mix marinade ingredients and pour over chicken wings. Marinate for four hours or overnight.

Mix coating mixture. Heat oil in wok or heavy skillet over high heat. Coat chicken wings in flour mixture and deep fry until golden brown. Drain on crumpled paper towels and serve hot. Makes 6 servings.

CHINESE FIVE-SPICE POWDER

This is an excellent spice to have on hand for almost any Chinese dish but difficult to find with a hechsher. If you can't buy it ready mixed, make your own. This is a good substitute.

2 tbsp. cinnamon
4 tsp. crushed aniseed
4 tsp. ground allspice
2 tsp. ground cloves
dash pepper

Mix together and store in covered jar. Makes about ½ cup.

HOISIN SAUCE

Many Chinese recipes call for Hoisin Sauce and, like Five-Spice Powder, this can be difficult to find kosher. This also is a good substitute for the real thing.

½ cup soy sauce
2 tbsp. honey
4 tsp. oil
½ tsp. garlic powder
4 tbsp. sesame paste (techinah)
2 tbsp. vinegar
½ tsp. hot pepper sauce

Mix all ingredients in food processor until smooth. Store in a covered jar in refrigerator. Makes 1 cup.

Women helping women – in and out of the kitchen

About 60 women chefs are coming together at Roy Thomson Hall on Sept. 26 to showcase their talents and fight breast cancer at Eat to The Beat, the annual fundraising event to support Willow Breast Cancer Support Canada.

Willow helps Canadians affected by breast cancer by providing free expert knowledge, understanding and support, and empowering them to make informed decisions about their diagnosis and treatment options.

Eat to the Beat was created by sisters Lisa and Abigail Slater in 1995 – it raised $75,000 that year– and to date, the event has raised more than $2 million.

Lisa, a self-taught chef who along with her sister grew up in the restaurant business, says they started the event because they wanted to help the organization raise money so that it could provide its "much needed services to thousands of Canadians who need them.

"We had [also] long wanted to produce a food event that showcased female chefs because, as one myself, I felt that many of these women and behind-the-scene professionals did not get the attention they deserved."

In a "horrible irony of life," says Abigail – she sits on Willow's board – her sister-in-law, an Eat to the Beat committee member, died of breast cancer three years ago. "It brought home once again the importance of our work."

Willow is unique, she says, because it focuses on peer support that is delivered by breast cancer survivors. "A person's first point of contact is with a woman who has been through it and is calming and supportive."

Abigail says Eat to the Beat is a true example of how "women can help other women in and out of the kitchen. It was astonishing to call these women and discover how many had been affected by breast cancer."

Eat to the Beat, which usually attracts about 1,000 people, features food sampling, wines and beers, entertainment and a silent auction.

Lisa offers the following recipe from the Eat to the Beat cookbook, which she edited in 2002.

BLUEBERRY CHEESE COFFEE CAKE
Submitted by Daphna Rabinovitch

Crumb topping
1 cup all purpose flour
¼ cup brown sugar
¼ cup sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
⅓ cup unsalted butter

Cheese Filling
8 oz. cream cheese
¼ cup sugar
1 egg
1 tsp. finely grated lemon rind

Batter
⅓ cup unsalted butter, softened
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
1½ cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
¾ cup sugar
¼ tsp. salt
½ cup light sour cream
1½ cups wild blueberries, fresh or frozen

Crumb topping: In a small bowl, combine flour, both sugars and cinnamon. Drizzle butter evenly over top. Toss until thoroughly moistened. Set aside.

Cheese Filling: In the bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the paddle attachment, beat the cream cheese with the sugar until light and fluffy, scraping down sides of bowl.

Beat in the egg and the lemon rind just until smooth. Set aside.

Batter

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-in. springform pan with non-stick spray.

In the bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the paddle attachment, beat the butter with the sugar until well combined. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well and scraping after each addition. Add vanilla. Remove from the mixer.

In a separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt.

Using a wooden spoon, stir the flour into the butter mixture alternately with the sour cream in three additions, mixing thoroughly but gently.

Spread the batter evenly in the prepared pan, mounding it slightly in the centre.

Sprinkle ⅔ cup of the blueberries over top. Gently spread cream cheese filling over the blueberries. Sprinkle with remaining blueberries. Bake for about one hour and 15 minutes or until the edges are set and just beginning to come away from the sides of the pan. Let cool in pan on a wire rack for 30 minutes. Serve warm or at room temperature.

'Jewish values go along with vegetarian values,' Rabbi says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Being an ovolacto vegetarian is almost as important a part of her being as being Jewish, says Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

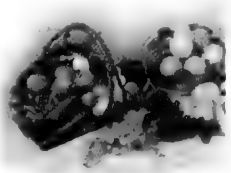
"I believe that Jewish values go along with vegetarian values," says Rabbi Goldstein who, along with her husband Baruch Sienna and their three sons, eats eggs and dairy products but no meat, and wears no leather.

"Jews wear no leather on Yom Kippur because it's hard to ask forgiveness for our sins when we stand in the skin of a slaughtered animal. We take that a step further and live it everyday."

As they have been vegetarians for 30 years, the couple's sons, ages 16, 15 and 12, have never eaten meat. "When each of our older sons had their bar mitzvah, we gave them the choice of eating kosher meat outside of our home.

"Both boys said 'no,' and I am proud of them for that. There is really no reason to eat meat. It is not for sustenance. It is for our taste buds.

"I feel distraught at the thought of a calf being raised just to be killed and land on my plate," Rabbi Goldstein says.



Their meals, during holidays and all year round are full of variety, she says.

"Our Yom Kippur pre-fast meal always starts with a vegetarian soup such as barley mushroom or lentil. Barley is a good, solid grain, and it fills you up.

"Our main course is always tofu, made in any number of ways. We bake it in teriyaki sauce or make tofu parmesan. We've taken chicken recipes and substituted the chicken with firm tofu. It works great."

A brown rice pilaf with almonds, onions and mushrooms is always a hit, she says, and they also use a lot of quinoa and wheatberries. "These foods are loaded with protein, but don't have the heaviness of meat. I haven't had a hard fast in 30 years."

Their Shabbat meals during the year always revolve around an ethnic theme, such as Italian or Japanese. "We've had sushi Shabbat and we've made Indian food. Our boys eat everything, and our oldest son always makes dessert to go along with the theme.

"By doing this, we feel connected to the Jewish community around the world, and we feel comfortable when we travel because we know about their foods."

Wine adds flavour to your food

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Cooking with wine intensifies and enhances the flavour of food. In fact, wine actually releases some hidden flavours. The alcohol does not become more concentrated as you cook, it burns off. So a fruity wine will concentrate those flavours and give a fruity flavour to the final dish. A sweet wine will provide sweetness to the final dish.

Wines labelled "cooking wine" are typically salty and include other additives that may adversely affect the taste of your chosen menu. If you choose to use a cooking wine, adjust your recipe to reflect the salt content already in the wine.

So this holiday season, don't worry about uncorking several of those bottles of wine you've been saving for special occasions, because this year, not only will their sweet or dry full-bodied flavours be savoured with family and friends, the leftovers can be put to good use with the following fun and delicious recipes.

SALMON WITH WHITE WINE MUSTARD SAUCE

¼ tsp. salt, divided
⅛ tsp. black pepper
4 (6-oz.) salmon fillets (about 1 in. thick)
1 tbsp. butter or stick margarine, divided
3 tbsp. minced shallots
2 tbsp. dry white wine
¼ cup vegetable broth
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
¼ tsp. cornstarch
4 tsp. minced fresh tarragon

Sprinkle ⅛ tsp. salt and pepper over fish. Melt 1½ tsp. butter in a large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Add fish, and cook 7 minutes on each side or until fish flakes easily when tested with a fork. Remove from skillet, and keep warm.

Melt 1½ tsp. butter in skillet over medium heat. Add the shallots and sauté for 1 minute or until tender. Add wine, and cook for 30 seconds. Combine ⅛ tsp. salt, broth, Dijon mustard, and cornstarch, and stir with a whisk. Add to skillet, and bring to a boil. Reduce heat, and simmer until reduced to ¼ cup (about 1 minute). Spoon the sauce over the salmon, and sprinkle the top with tarragon. Serves 4.

TUSCAN BEEF STEW

You can make the stew sweeter by sautéing onions, celery and carrot in olive oil (instead of garlic and rosemary) along with the beef.

2 lb. stew beef
salt and freshly ground pepper
¼ cup olive oil
2 garlic cloves, peeled and cut in half
1 sprig rosemary
1 cup red wine
1 lb. ripe tomatoes, skinned and chopped, or 16 oz. canned, crushed tomatoes

Cut beef into 1½-in. cubes. Season with salt and pepper. Heat olive oil in a heavy-bottomed pot over medium-high heat. Add garlic and rosemary, stir for 1 minute, then add beef. Sauté, stirring frequently, until meat is well browned, about 15 minutes. If you don't have enough room, brown it in two batches (if the pieces are too close, they'll steam, not brown). When meat is browned, pour in the wine and deglaze, scraping up bits that have stuck to the bottom of the pot. Stir until wine reduces by at least half. Add the tomatoes, season to taste, then turn the heat to low and cover the pot. Simmer, stirring every 20 minutes or so, until the meat is very tender. This should take about 3 hours. While stew is simmering, add a splash of wine or a tablespoon of water if it gets too dry. Serves 6.

CHICKEN BRAISED WITH WINE AND TOMATOES

2 lb. chicken thighs (8 small or 4 large)
1 tbsp. cooking oil
⅔ cup chicken broth
¼ cup dry white wine or chicken broth
2 cloves garlic, minced
2 tsp. snipped fresh rosemary or ¼ tsp. dried rosemary, crushed
¼ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. black pepper
2 cups chopped Roma tomatoes (6 medium)
1 medium yellow sweet pepper, cut into ½-in.-wide strips
1 medium green sweet pepper, cut into ½-in.-wide strips
1½ cups sliced fresh mushrooms
2 tbsp.cornstarch
2 tbsp. cold water
2 cups hot cooked noodles or rice

Remove skin from chicken. In a large skillet, heat oil. Brown chicken in hot oil over medium heat about 5 minutes, turning chicken to brown evenly. Drain fat. Add broth, wine, garlic, dried rosemary (if using), salt and black pepper to chicken in skillet. Bring to boil and reduce heat. Cover and simmer about 20 minutes. Add tomatoes, sweet peppers and mushrooms to skillet. Simmer, covered, 15 minutes more or until chicken is tender and no longer pink. Transfer chicken to a serving dish, reserving vegetables and cooking liquid in skillet. Cover chicken with foil to keep warm.

In a small bowl, combine the cornstarch, water and fresh rosemary (if using), and stir into mixture in skillet. Cook and stir until thickened and bubbly. Cook and stir for 2 minutes more. Spoon vegetables and sauce around chicken. Serve with noodles or rice. Makes 4 servings.

The Way Forward

Report of the Task Force on Jewish Day School Education

September 2006

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Task Force on Jewish

New Jewish education structure recommended by UJA Federation task force

Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto proposed

The UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education is recommending creation of a new Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto, with a strategic and proactive mandate to ensure Toronto's leadership in the field of Jewish education. The centre, serving as UJA Federation's Jewish education and identity pillar, would assume the responsibilities of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education after a transition period that would end on June 30, 2007.

Dr. Seymour Epstein

"The recommended Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto is an exciting new entity that will be an umbrella organization for the overall strategy and implementation of Jewish education policy," said Morris Perlis, who chaired the task force with Lou Greenbaum. "The Centre will, among its other tasks, aggressively support the pursuit of government funding and build greater understanding of the community's educational needs."

"Inherent in the new structure is an education pillar that emphasizes strategic thinking and planning for the future, while working with the schools to pursue the highest possible quality of education," added Greenbaum.

The task force report says the need for structural change "emerged with increasing clarity" after extensive consultations that included Jewish education experts in several cities. The report concluded that a change to the Jewish education system structure is a prerequisite for meeting the altered educational expectations of both parents and students and increasing Jewish day school enrolment.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President of Jewish Education and Identity calls the task force report "a bold blueprint for enhancing both the profile and the role of Jewish education in communal life."

Although the task force is recommending a new Jewish education pillar with an invigorated proactive focus, it noted that Toronto's day schools hold BJE in high regard, in terms of services provided and relationships established.

The recommendation regarding the Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto is one of 23 covering education structure, quality, marketing and tuitions.

The task force report described the call to action as "clarion" after becoming immersed in what it viewed as the "richness of the Jewish day school system" amidst a "myriad of issues and complexities which the system must now address."

Report took nearly a year

A 10 month journey of discovery. That's how the UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education describes the time between its formation and the recent publication of its report, which makes 23 recommendations covering many essential aspects of Toronto's Jewish education system.

The task force was initiated in September 2005 to assess the strategic role of UJA Federation in enhancing and supporting Jewish day school education. Chaired by Lou Greenbaum and Morris Perlis, the task force included Jonathan Goodman as a committee member as well. UJA Federation invests nearly $12 million annually in Jewish education - about two-thirds of it on tuition subsidies for parents who cannot afford full day school fees.

During its investigation, the task force consulted with Board of Jewish Education officials, Jewish schools, representatives from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other North American federations, in addition to outside consultants.,

Task force recommendations include maintaining at least the same level of tuition subsidies, a pilot tuition loan program, funding to launch a $100 million education endowment and a quality review process for general and Jewish studies at individual schools.

Morris Perlis

Lou Greenbaum

Members of the task force found both a rich history of Jewish education in Toronto and several causes for concern.

"School funding and family affordability need concerted attention. Quality must be at benchmark levels. Marketing requires investment spending. Governance policies, processes and structures need upgrading," notes the report.

Without significant changes to structure, funding, quality and marketing, warns the report, the future of day school education in Toronto is at risk. The report cites several risk factors, such as indifference to Jewish education, a larger number of day schools and a lower number of Jewish births.

The overall vision of the task force displays a deep dedication to Jewish education, says co-chair Morris Perlis.

"We want to assure a vibrant, thriving Jewish education system, with integrated initiatives to provide a superior educational experience, and to foster the highest level of affiliation throughout the broader community."

The task force is also seeking increased cooperation and collaboration among individual schools in the system.

However, the bottom line, stresses task force co-chair Lou Greenbaum, is the best possible use of community dollars spent on Jewish education.

"Our recommendations are aimed at ensuring that every dollar spent on day school education makes a difference," he says.

Federation adapts to change

The proposed establishment of a new Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto represents a transition consistent with Jewish community history. The centre, proposed by the UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education, would serve as the strategic and administrative hub of Jewish education in the city.

"UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has not only been deeply involved with Jewish education for nearly 60 years, but it is also considered a world leader in Jewish education," noted the organization's current chair of the board, David Engel.

The Bureau of Jewish Education was established in 1949 and 19 years later, it was re-organized to become the Board of Jewish Education - a department of UJA Federation. Since then, successive studies have identified challenges facing Jewish education and recommended new directions in philosophy, structure and policy.

In 1975, implementation began of recommendations made by the Study Committee on Jewish Education, including tuition subsidies for families that cannot afford full fees at Jewish day schools. Today, these subsidies amount to nearly $8 million annually.

In 1996, UJA Federation's Commission on Jewish Education identified education accessibility to every member of the community as one of its six guiding principles.

"Today's task force report symbolizes the ongoing evolution of UJA Federation policy to meet current needs," said Engel. "The new Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto will enhance our leadership role in this critical area of Jewish life."

Day School Education

UJA Federation Task Force proposes new measures to deal with high education costs

A pilot loan program, a $100 million education endowment fund and vigorous pursuit of government funding for faith-based schools are just three of the recommendations proposed by the UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education to encourage higher Jewish school enrolment. The task force also suggested that UJA Federation tuition subsidies, that currently amount to $7.8 million annually, should remain at the same level, as a minimum.

However, of all the recommendations, the task force concluded that government funding would have the greatest influence on the cost of Jewish education.

"No action will have a greater impact on the affordability of the day school system than a change in the provincial funding mechanism," said Morris Perlis, who co-chaired the task force with Lou Greenbaum.

The task force found that Jewish elementary school tuition costs in schools funded by the Board of Jewish Education have increased from an average of $7,781 in 2001 to $10,169 in 2006, with the greatest impact being borne by middle-income parents.

The report observed that Jewish schools are having trouble keeping pace with operating and capital costs because of funding and tuition assistance limitations.

To help remedy the situation, the task force is proposing a pilot program, based on a U.S. model, through which parents could borrow funds at reasonable rates from financial institutions to pay for the cost of Jewish education. Administration of the loan initiative would rest with UJA Federation's new Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto.

The report also strongly endorsed UJA Federation's intention to raise money for a $100 million endowment fund for Jewish education, noting that resources should be provided to not only launch the fund but to "grow" it as well.

Among the many other recommendations related to the cost of education is consideration of shared services among schools to generate efficiencies and cost savings.

Task force focuses on education quality

With a direct challenge for schools to become "highly competitive centres of best practice," the UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education is recommending a quality review process for individual schools in both general and Jewish studies. The reviews, which would be conducted by a third party expert in school assessment, would take into account the specific ideologies and teaching techniques of individual schools. In addition, the task force foresees financial incentives for schools which meet or exceed certain criteria.

In developing its recommendation, the task force noted the importance of the highest possible educational quality as a key factor when parents decide on day school for their children.

The task force is seeking stronger quality accountability by schools to the community through UJA Federation's new Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto, and, points out, task force co-chair Lou Greenbaum, there are ways in which schools can help each other.

"Central to advancement of quality is the the sharing of best practices across the day school system, bringing teachers and administrators together in communities of interest and professional development," he said.

As for the centre itself, the task force is recommending extensive professional development consultation by centre personnel for school administrators, educators and boards.

Task force members also want the community to know about the value of Jewish education through more comprehensive marketing.

The task force endorsed a report by the Board of Jewish Education marketing committee calling for an education marketing specialist to be hired who would oversee marketing research and develop new marketing initiatives.

Mixed picture for day school enrolment

Enrolment at Jewish high schools is up. The number of students at elementary day schools is down and the number of schools has increased.

That's part of Toronto's Jewish education portrait uncovered by the UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education, which recently submitted its report.

Between 2000 and 2005, enrolment at high schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education picked up by about 15%, while affiliated elementary school enrolment decreased by approximately nine percent from 2001-2006. However, elementary school enrolment as a percentage of the cohort (the total number of Jewish children available in that age group) remained relatively unchanged at close to 29%.

At the same time, the number of elementary schools has jumped from 13-19 - a phenomenon labelled by the task force as "boutiquing."

"This phenomenon, while beneficial to enhancing parental choice, is impacting the viability of any given school, in several cases acutely; and exacerbating the cost pressures in the overall system, said committee member Jonathan Goodman.

As for the decrease in elementary school enrolment, the task force attributes it to a host of factors, including demographic changes, the increased attractiveness of the public school system as well as other private schools; and declining Jewish affiliation.

Other trends discovered by the task force are a tendency toward reduced Jewish affiliation and "disaffection" within the Toronto Jewish community, and a continuing migration of young Jewish families to York Region, north of Steeles Avenue. "This migration will add to the complexities of the day school system," warns the report. "Schools south of Steeles Avenue may likely experience a decline in enrolment and schools in the north may encounter upward pressure on class size."

Summary of Task Force on Jewish Day School Recommendations

The following is an abbreviated summary of major recommendations presented by the UJA Federation Task Force on Jewish Day School Education, grouped into four categories: structure, funding, quality, and marketing.

These recommendations and the implementation process are subject to determination by the UJA Federation Board of Directors.

Structure Recommendations

- To ensure that the goals articulated and identified in the report can be achieved by the community, structural change is the prerequisite. The Jewish Education and Identity pillar of UJA Federation will be strengthened and tentatively renamed the Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto with a proactive and strategic mandate. The Task Force recommends that the new Centre for Jewish Education become a reality by June 30, 2007.

Funding Recommendations

- Ensure that all resources possible are provided to actively and vigorously pursue government funding. It is the belief of the Task Force that no action will have a greater impact on the affordability of the day school system than a change in the provincial funding mechanism to assure equity with other provincially funded school systems.
- UJA Federation should provide funding to successfully launch and grow the $100 million Education Endowment Fund.
- Tuition subsidization funding should be at least at current levels (Approximately $7.8 million per annum).
- New proposals should be considered to relieve the financial impact of tuitions on middle-income families.
- Maintain funding for special needs education at a minimum at current levels which is $806,000 in addition to the $7.8 million for tuition subsidies.
- Introduce a test loan program with a capital base provided by an institutional third party (per the U.S. model), with UJA Federation costs being administration and marketing. While the intent of this program is to alleviate the disproportionate tuition burden being borne by middle-income families, it should be available to any family which meets the criteria.
- Undertake a study to determine the feasibility of a community middle school at the Lebovic Campus on Bathurst, north of Rutherford.
- Develop a strategy for the development of all other schools on the campus.

Quality Recommendations:

- The Task Force recommends implementation of a quality review process at the individual school level for both general and Jewish studies, conducted by a third party expert in school assessment. This quality review process should be tied to financial incentives for schools which meet or exceed certain criteria.
- It is strongly recommended that the new Centre for Jewish Education of Toronto devote new resources to enhance the day school community culture to foster a greater sense of mutuality and collaboration.

Marketing Recommendations:

- Hire the appropriate marketing professional to spearhead a market research endeavour and to formulate and implement marketing strategies including community-wide campaigns.
- Promote the gathering of in-depth market data on an ongoing basis to better determine the education-related needs of different parent segments.

Volunteer bonds with kids in Israeli-based program

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For Kim Edwards, spending part of her summer volunteering for Save a Child's Heart (SACH) in Israel isn't a completely selfless act.

"People have told me how I have made a difference there, but in all honesty, the children, the staff and the doctors have made a much greater impact in my life than I could have ever imagined," Edwards said.

For the past two summers, Edwards, a fourth-year psychology student at Queens University spent six weeks at a time playing, dancing, and laughing with children from all over the world who are brought to Israel through the Save a Child's Heart program.

The goal of the non-profit outreach program is to train medical personnel in less developed countries and create centres to enable doctors and nurses to provide needed treatment in their own environment. Until that goal is achieved, children with congenital heart problems are brought to Israel for surgery and other cardiac care.

SACH has an agreement with the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, a suburb of Tel Aviv, that permits the organization to use all the facilities of the hospital, provided that they are able to raise the $10,000 it costs to perform the surgery on each patient.

While the children are waiting for, and recovering from, their surgeries, volunteers and staff attend to the patients by doing what they can to make them feel comfortable.

Edwards first heard of SACH after Hillel at Queens helped raise money and awareness for the organization.

As a high school student, Edwards volunteered often for an array of organizations, such as the Bloorview MacMillan Children's Centre for children who are differently abled; the ORT program, which helps recently immigrated Canadian children learn how to use a computer; and the Hospital for Sick Children. She was also a soccer coach, and in her last year of high school, she worked at Camp Trillium in Ontario, a camp for kids diagnosed with cancer.

"I was planning on going to Israel last summer anyway to volunteer with Magen David Adom and I was looking for something to take up the second half of the summer in Israel," Edwards said, adding that in the summer of 2005, she spent six weeks with MDA.

"When I found out about SACH, I thought this was something I would really enjoy... I really like getting new experiences and I love working with children who are ill. That's kind of my passion. I love the way they have a zest for life."

She explained that children over the age of three typically come without their families and being separated from them during such a difficult time takes a toll on them.

"They really need someone who is going to look out for them and give them the love they need."

As a volunteer, Edwards bunked with the patients and nurses in a house provided by SACH in Azur, a Tel Aviv suburb, which is about a 10-minute drive from the Wolfson Medical Center.

Although she has a lot of experience working with children with special needs, she said that this was no typical camp experience.

"You don't have the supplies you have at camp. You can't run to the arts and crafts room to grab a bunch of beads."

Instead, Edwards said she created memorable relationships with the children by dancing, baking cookies, making popcorn and giving out lots of hugs.

"You have to communicate with these children in different ways than you are used to because most of them don't speak English, or they speak very limited English. To have children from Iraq, Vietnam, Zanzibar, Ethiopia, where the cultures are so different, you learn to communicate with your hands."

She spoke about the special bond she formed with Salama, a four-year-old Ethiopian patient who looked like she was two.

She said she was very weak when she arrived, but after the surgery, and after getting over the initial shock of being away from her family, she warmed up to Edwards and the other volunteers.

"I fell in love with this child. I will never forget her."

Edwards, who arrived in Israel just days before the Israel-Hezbollah war began, contemplated flying home early when the violence began.

"I remember thinking at the end, at the airport, how happy I was that I stayed because I think if I went home I would have regretted it and felt like I left my children behind."

If she had left, she would not have experienced, what she called, one of the most gratifying moments as a SACH volunteer.

"I met a Palestinian child at the hospital who was four years old. I played with him a few times and his was the first surgery I was able to see," she said, explaining that the doctors allowed her to stand in the operating room to watch the procedures performed on the children she had been taking care of.

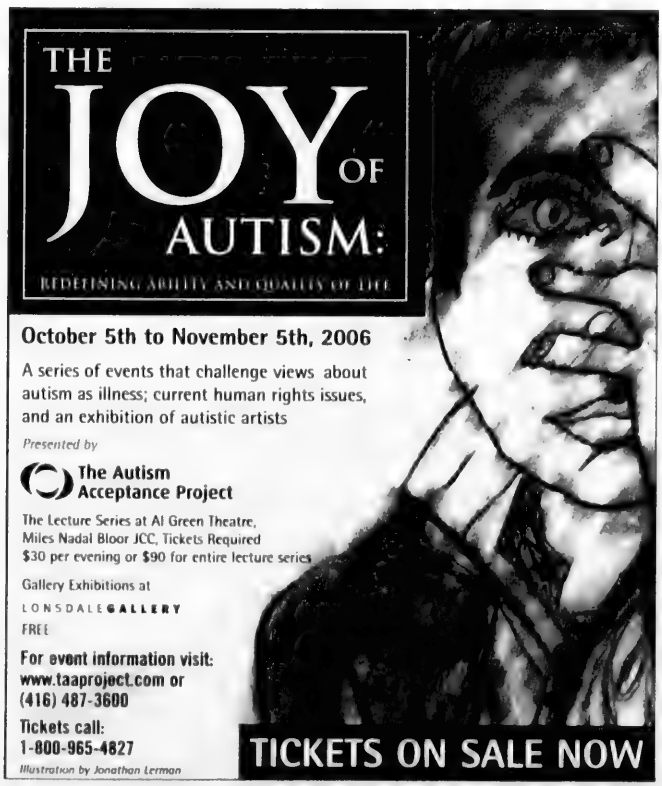
"After I came out of the surgery, his father came up to me and he thanked me because he took his son down to surgery and saw me in [medical scrubs]."

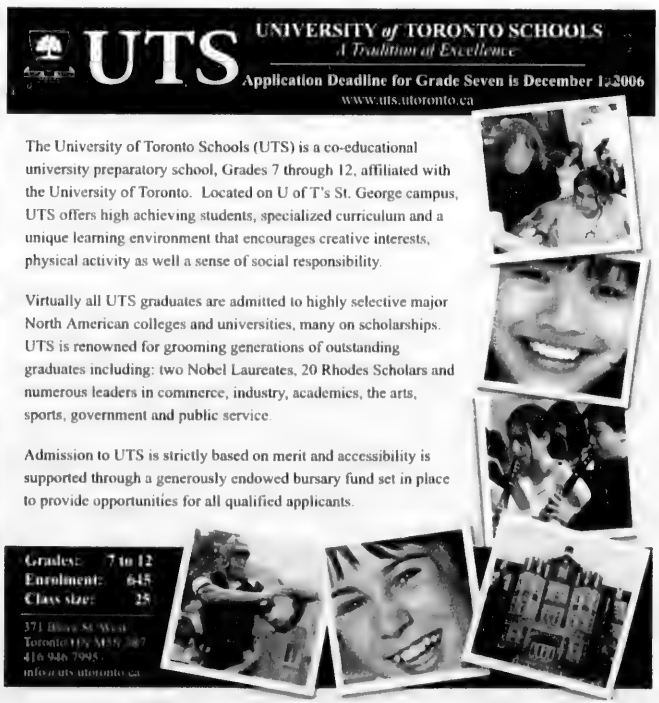
She said after trying to explain to the father who spoke very little English that she wasn't a doctor, in his broken English, he expressed to her how grateful he was to her that she was there as a friend to his son.

"That was something I will never forget because it was a big moment for me to realize the impact someone can have even just being there for a child," Edwards said.

"It is also incredible to see that even while there is a war going on, in another part of Israel, you have Palestinian children, Christian children, Jewish children from all over the world playing together."

She said now she feels like she has family all over the world and can't wait to volunteer for SACH for a third time next summer.





Philanthropist donates $500,000 to Carleton U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ottawa-based Jewish philanthropist Max Zelikovitz has donated $500,000 to help Carleton University develop its Jewish studies and research centre.

The donation to the Centre for Jewish Studies and Research, made earlier this month, was given in honour of his wife, Tessie, who died in 1985. The centre has been renamed the Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies.

The gift, which will be matched with funds from the E. Bower Carty Endowment at Carleton, will allow the centre to sponsor courses, mini-courses, lectures and presentations for Ottawa students at Carleton and beyond, and for the rest of the Jewish community, said Aviva Freedman, the centre's director and a linguistics and applied language studies professor at Carleton.

When the research centre was established more than a year ago, Freedman said it became apparent that more than 20 people were doing active research in the area of Jewish studies, but they didn't know each other because they came from different disciplines.

Aviva Freedman, director of the Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies.

She said that until Zelikovitz agreed to make this donation, the research centre didn't have the funds to make their findings available to students and the community at large.

"There is a large number of researchers who are performing active research in cross-disciplinary areas related to Jewish studies right now. Most of them teach in other areas, and their interests in Jewish studies are reflected only in their research," Freedman said.

"The centre will allow us to bring these researchers together, to give them a forum and to allow for cross-fertilization of ideas, to encourage undergraduate and graduate students to do related research, and to bring all this rich research to the attention of Carleton students and the Ottawa Jewish community."

Freedman said she also hopes to invite international scholars to Carleton, and to develop linkages with other universities. For example, she added, Carleton is already in the process of establishing research links with Israeli schools such as the University of Haifa and Tel Aviv University.

Some of the areas the centre will focus on are Jewish history, culture, literature, art, music and film; Jewish diasporic experiences, Jewish mysticism, and key historical events, such as the Holocaust.

Margo Kardish, Zelikovitz's daughter, said that her father's decision to give a substantial gift to a cause that promotes Jewish education didn't come as a surprise to her.

"He always believed very, very much [in education]. He always wanted his kids, his grandchildren, everybody to be highly educated, be doctors, lawyers, you know, like all immigrants who want their kids to be better off than they were," Kardish said on behalf of her Lithuanian-born father.

Since moving to Ottawa in 1921, Zelikovitz, who will celebrate his 97th birthday in October, built a successful career in the Ottawa area.

"He came with nothing. He peddled on the streets fruits and vegetables in those days," she said.

Zelikovitz, who is very involved with Congregation Beth Shalom in Ottawa, later worked in the wholesale business and in real estate. In 1984, he and his wife established a family charitable foundation to support local area charities.

"He came from nothing and he made his money in this community, so I feel he wanted to give back," Kardish said, speculating on why her father would choose to support the centre.

"I think he is very into education because he thinks the best way to promote understanding is through education."

Although this donation has generated a lot of attention for Zelikovitz and his family, Kardish stressed that her father is a quiet man who prefers to remain out of the media spotlight.

"He gives, but he doesn't like all the hoopla. He is a wonderful man, very good-natured, very into Judaism," Kardish said. "We're very proud of him."

Freedman said the centre is grateful to Zelikovitz and to the family for their support.

"He is giving us the fuel to allow all of this to really be put into motion with considerable momentum."

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 200 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind promise "big changes" in the days, weeks and months ahead. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

New Year, old habits. Some good things never change!

Chakra balancing clears the path to inner peace

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Susan Shienfield is an intuitive healer specializing in guided meditation, which is used in the art of chakra balancing. In chakra balancing, cellular memory is released to allow a clearer path to inner peace.

Shienfield works out of The Briars Spa, a progressive-minded spa located in a rather conservative establishment – the Briars Resort and Conference Centre on Lake Simcoe in Jackson's Point, an hour's drive north of Toronto.

Shienfield, 53, has been married to entrepreneur Gary Shienfield for 32 years. The couple have two sons, Korey, 28, and Shaun, 26.

Twenty years ago, Shaun was diagnosed with Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD). Not wanting her child to take medication, Shienfield went on a search throughout North America for an alternative. Through her travels she discovered and learned about energy work, first using it to help her son, then to help others by running a Toronto-based private practice.

Five years ago, Jackson's Point, where she went to the cottage as a child, beckoned to her. The Shienfields sold their Toronto home and moved to the area.

Jackson's Point was a popular summer retreat for Jewish families a number of years ago, and Shienfield was drawn back there because the local synagogue is minutes away from The Briars. She says the area is known as a healing place because of its history as a sacred Indian burial ground.

Shienfield is the granddaughter and sister of rabbis. Her brother, Rabbi Paul Plotkin, is a Florida-based author who has written a book about healing through the Psalms called The Lord Is My Shepherd, Why Do I Still Want?

"We both come from the same family of spiritual healers – we've just chosen different modalities to get there, but we both strongly believe in helping others," Shienfield says.

"The Briars Spa, under the tutelage of spa manager Terry Cranswick, offered me an opportunity to showcase my healing, and it has been a win-win situation for everybody because The Briars is such an established place. It is so respected, therefore I gained the respect."

Hugh Sibbald, vice-president of The Briars, says that when the spa opened more than five years ago, it was decided that the spa should reflect "the kind of history that we have here, but yet [we] wanted it to feel very contemporary. So part of creating this was to ensure that we had therapists that were real healers.

"Susan had recently arrived in the area and contacted us. Immediately after experiencing the treatment, we realized she could be a tremendous help to our guests. People found the treatment extremely helpful. What she does in her treatment helps you help yourself – our guests find that very empowering."

Shienfield's chakra-balancing treatment consists of a two-hour session at the cost of $279. Her clientele is 90 per cent female, between the ages of 35 and 55. "I help guide people on how to meditate, find where they are holding their stress, how to release it and manage it. I teach them the tools of how to help themselves both physically and mentally, so that they can live a stress-free life," she says.

"After discussing with my clients their stress symptoms, they listen to a guided meditation, while I put my hands over energy centres to help release negative energy. By doing this, I pick up patterns in their lives that they keep repeating. Most people sabotage their own healing and, in turn, from getting what they want, whether it's in relationships or health.

"Basically the treatment is much like a computer. We are able to 'google' in people's stress symptoms and then the information comes out. This information can pertain to the client's present or from their childhood," Shienfield says.

Skirts are either very long or short

By FRANCINE BIRKEN
Special to The CJN

The new Chanel fall/winter ready-to-wear collection took the stage with a show in black and white, and was sometimes accented with blush rose or beige.

In the fall/winter collection are tweed suits, miniskirts and short coats. Chanel director Karl Lagerfeld says: "Today, everything is focused on the legs. The skirts must be very short or very long, never in between."

Jewelled belts and gold chains are the statement buckle. Silk blouses with pleated bib fronts or delicate "jabots" (ruffles) are matched up with these wonderful fashions.

Silk shirtdresses are worn under tweed jackets and cashmere cardigans. The dress, the buttoned leather skirt, the long striped cashmere cardigan and the cape-jacket are all important aspects of the collection.

Chanel's thigh-high boots, either in python or leather, give that sleek modern look to the final finish. Don't forget the larger handbags in black patent leather.

The collection's "little black dress" creates a new image either with a defined waist or a large cashmere sweater look.

For your mysterious evening look, wear lace or satin pajama pants with long embroidered or pin-tucked gowns. Chanel's short dancing dresses, fitted frock-coats and gowns with tulle and satin ribbon flounces are decorated with appliqué crystals, beads and rhinestones.

Legs are slimmer in this fall's jeans

For the fall, jeans come in darker washes and slimmer leg and boot cuts. Appliqués are featured on back pockets.

Paige Premium Denim makes jeans that really fit a woman. All its jeans styles are standouts, with innovative back-pocket leather treatments. This line has taken Canada by storm and can be found on the shelves at all prominent retailers.

FireTrap is a United Kingdom-based fashion jeans-wear brand with hints of rock 'n' roll, femininity and pure trend. Firetrap has a unique feminine look with a sportswear edge.

The men's FireTrap collection consists of form-fitting denims, bold tees, fine-gauge knit polos, beautifully detailed woven tops and leading-edge outerwear.

The women's FireTrap collection consists of beautiful cottons, knits for those late nights on the town, and sheer sexy wovens for the fashion forward and confident woman.

FireTrap's accessories collection caters to both men and women, and consists of beautiful bags, belts, hats, scarves and ties. FireTrap's footwear is the new step up in fashion and style.

Frankie B. Jeans is a Los Angeles- based denim company that caters to the sexy woman. Frankie B.'s boot-cut and slim-leg fits have beautiful embroidered back pockets and hardware (i.e. metal) detailing on trends and themes of music.

Other lines that Weinberg represents are SuperDry, a European premium cotton T-shirt collection for all seasons; Triple Five Soul – a jeans wear fashion line that caters to men and women of all ages with fashion tops and jackets; and Canada Goose, the leading force in the world of extreme-weather outerwear and now fashion. Baby blue, white, army green and yellow are the prime colours for the Canada Goose bomber jacket. Whether you are exploring the Arctic or exploring the urban landscape Canada Goose has you covered!

Sweater coats are back in style

By FRANCINE BIRKEN
Special to The CJN

Bold prints, cinched waists, leggings, skinny jeans, bulky sweaters and big bows are strong for this fall season. Fabrics are cashmere, mohair, corduroy, velvet, leather and fine wools. Colours that will be seen are smoky greys, camel, taupe, chocolate browns, navy blue, red, plum and mahogany.

This season's sweaters come in oversize shapes and have a feeling of looseness and volume. The hits of fall fashion are sweater coats, which are back in style, and sweater dresses, also back in style. For an elegant look, a sweater dress could be paired with a cashmere coat.

The tulip skirt has made a comeback, yet the classic cigarette skirt that stops at the knee is still considered elegant and classic. But don't put away the miniskirt – it's still a sexy statement.

The belt is back to stay. Sashes, ribbon ties and ties with bows are the hottest new trends. Bring out your 1950s wide leather belt and wear it with a cinched skirt.

Make sure to accessorize with an oversized handbag and layered jewelry.

The exciting news is the return of the leggings.

With all of these wonderful fashions and accessories, complete your outfit with the ankle-length boot or thigh-high boot.

Take a good look through your wardrobe, add what you need and get inspired by all these beautiful fashions. Enjoy this colourful time of year.

Chakra helps manage stress

Three years ago, while ministering chakra balancing at the resort spa, she met Jim Chalmers of the Mandela Group, a Canadian book distribution company. He told her that "chakra" was a word heard a lot in his industry. Impressed by his session, he was pleased to find out that Shienfield was working on a book. He paved the way for her kit to be published out of the United States.

The kit, The Art of Chakra Balancing, includes a guided mediation CD, a crystal to concentrate on while meditating and healing cards. In addition, there is a companion book called Balance for Success. Out since last April, the kit has been distributed around the world. The first printing of 15,000 was bought up by bookstores. Some copies are still available at Chapters, Indigo, at The Briars and online through www.amazon.com or Shienfield's own website: www.balanceforsuccess.com.

Out of her publishing success, the doors opened to lecturing, teaching and media appearances for Shienfield.

Being busy is no excuse for neglecting fitness

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

Today's busy career people spend so much time sitting in front of a computer screen that they barely have time to work out.

People are often so consumed with their to-do lists that they invariably put exercise on the back burner.

Fitness guru Alan Pearson, the author of Fit 4 Work, a slim, softcover pocketbook, has created exercises for people at work. Now, sedentary jobs are no excuse for poor posture or slacking off fitness routines. By practising these exercises a few times a week for 15 minutes at a desk, participants can improve posture and activate their muscular systems.

Fit 4 Work, a British guide distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, offers easy ways to stay fit and remain alert at work. The contents include chapters on warming up, general exercise, resistance training, dynamic flex, posture, and mental and visual exercises as well as exercise programs.

In the book, Pearson is cited as a "driving force behind the renowned sports training organization SAQ International." Physiotherapist Kim Chesterfield, director of Therapeutics Ltd., in the book's foreword, writes that the majority of joint and soft-tissue injuries she treats, excluding sports injuries, are either a direct or indirect result of poor posture.

"Most bad postural habits are the result of not sitting properly for long hours at work. Our bodies are designed to move and stretch, so long hours of static, poor posture leads to muscle and joint fatigue, in addition to poor flexibility. These eventually manifest themselves as pain," she says.

In addition to exercise, Pearson advises readers to drink water at regular intervals throughout the working day. Keep a bottle of water at the desk and drink frequently. Unfortunately, coffee and tea are diuretics, so take it easy on these beverages.

To get the most help from Fit 4 Work, readers are instructed to do the individual exercises or follow the special daily and weekly programs outlined. Even those who find it difficult to follow directions without the guidance of a teacher will attest to the clarity of the author's explanations, which are accompanied by helpful illustrations.

The book's mental exercises are designed to help stimulate brain functions throughout the day. Practise them before work and at times of mental fatigue to boost performance.

Pearson points out that the work environment makes many demands on a person's eyesight. Workers have to assess different sizes, judge layouts and differences in colour, and often they stare at monitors for long hours without blinking. He recommends some good exercises to avoid eye strain.

Proper breathing is also important. Just before starting the exercises, breathe in, and as you breathe in, bring your tummy in gently. Breathe out, breathe in again, and holding the contraction of your tummy – not your breath – continue to breathe normally. This will improve your posture. Before lunchtime and after work, try to walk as much as possible.

Alternate toe raises are one of the exercises you can do at your desk. The aim of this exercise is to maintain ankle mobility, and it works the calf and shin muscles to promote blood flow. Working one foot at a time, raise your toes up off the floor and toward your shin to a comfortable height while keeping your heel on the floor. In case you are worried you are not doing it right, the author provides a do and don't list. Here he says, "Do maintain the upright posture, relax, control your breathing and develop a rhythm. Don't force the movement or rock in your office chair."

Exercises for hips, arms, shoulders, and knees are also included in the book.

The one thing all 40 exercises have in common is that they are done without leaving the office. True, working out at the office may not prove as exhilarating as a session at the gym, but it's free and instantly accessible.

Popularity of the trench coat: influenced by military

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Along with the proverbial little black dress for women and a dark suit for men, fashionable clothes closets should include a trench coat, which is good for all types of climates and available in sporty, funky and dressy designs.

This versatile outerwear, usually made of heavy cotton, twill or leather, often with a zip-out lining, is practical for all seasons, and especially good for our unpredictable fall and winter weather. It is considered a wardrobe essential for almost everyone.

The original design was a creation of Thomas Burberry as a raincoat for army officers in the early 1900s. It was modified during World War I to include epaulettes, straps and D-rings, and it became part of the service uniform of British officers. Soldiers who wore the long coats in the trenches (trench warfare was a form of war in which both opposing armies had static lines of fortifications dug into the ground, facing each other) began referring to it as a trench coat. By World War II, it became part of the enlisted men's and officers' gear and was adopted by many military forces around the world and worn on the battlefield in cold weather.

The military style waterproof coat, belted and with deep pockets, was an ankle-length 10-button double-breasted garment in tan, khaki, beige or black, with cuff straps on the sleeves and epaulettes on the shoulders. The epaulettes were for holding gloves and folded service caps, and the belt with the brass D-rings was to secure grenades, side arms or swords.

The world of fashion is often influenced by uniforms and work gear, and the military trench coat soon became a popular all-weather garment worn by men and women around the world. The easy-to-wear coat continues to be the "in" thing, especially since characters in movies and on television keep the style in the forefront of fashion with movies such as Casablanca and Roger Rabbit, and television shows like Columbo. Seinfeld followers may remember the hysterical episode called the Executive Trench Coat, about a beltless style.

This season, fashionistas of both sexes will be sporting all sorts of trench coat styles, from the classic, single-breasted sash-strap look, to double-breasted ankle-length flowing coats with buckled belts, in fabrics ranging from casual cottons and corduroys to velvets, satins and leathers in a rainbow of colours and lightweight textiles that are perfect for travel across town or across the world.

Today's trench coat designs include short, sporty styles for run-around shopping, as well as funky fashions in iridescent and patterned materials and longer lengths for formal wear, some with wide swinging skirts and cinched waists.

The old-fashioned trench coat has changed with the times, but its popularity remains strong. It has become a stylish and sophisticated easy-to-wear cover up garment suitable for all types of weather, for any occasion and for males and females of all ages.

NDP resolution slams Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A New Democratic MP is joining Israel's ambassador to Canada and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) in slamming the NDP for passing two "emergency resolutions" at its recent convention that are highly critical of Israel.

The legislator, Winnipeg Centre MP Pat Martin, apologized for the party's stance, saying there are many in the NDP "and the left who do not subscribe to these views."

The resolutions at the centre of the controversy focus on Lebanon and the Israeli/Palestinian conflict. The Lebanon resolution called Israel's response to Hezbollah's kidnapping of two of its soldiers and the killing of others "drastically disproportionate."

It also called Hezbollah, a terrorist organization under Canadian law, "a recognized political party with democratically elected members in Lebanon's parliament," and it places the Shebaa Farms, an area the United Nations has determined is Syrian territory, in Lebanon. (Hezbollah used the pretext of Israeli occupation of Shebaa Farms to justify its attacks against the Jewish state.)

In addition, the resolution calls for an immediate Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon, urges the federal government to "restore balance to Canada's approach in the Middle East" and pushes for more humanitarian relief for Lebanon.

The resolutions, passed at the party's biennial convention in Quebec City earlier this month, "are biased and one-sided," said CIC national chair Marc Gold. "It focuses on the alleged faults of Israel and ignores entirely the circumstances under which it was forced to act and react."

Gold said the resolutions will only serve to marginalize the party. "It saddens me how a militant fringe group within the party hijacked the resolutions to focus on Israel and neglect issues of world wide concern," he said.

Israeli ambassador Alan Baker said he was shocked and disappointed "at the inherent bias" that characterized the resolutions.

"The emergency resolutions are noteworthy for their failure to mention the thousands of Katyusha rockets fired by Hezbollah whose targets were the innocent civilians of northern Israel, nor do they acknowledge Hezbollah's status as a recognized terror organization according to Canadian law," the ambassador said in a news release.

Baker further criticized the New Democrats, saying, "If the NDP is genuinely concerned about violence and the targeting of civilians, their emergency resolutions should reflect the fact that Hezbollah's aims include the destruction of the State of Israel by terrorist means, something they recently attempted to achieve."

Martin, who represents Winnipeg Centre, said he was saddened by the position taken by the party. "I feel I should apologize for both the tone and the content" of the resolutions, he said. There were "many in the NDP and the left who do not subscribe to these views... I think we missed an opportunity to restore some balance to the public perception."

Martin said emotions in the party "are running high. The issue is vulnerable to being hijacked by people strident and intransigent in their views and the aggressive zealots win the day.

"Plenty in our party do no want to be associated with such strident language on the Middle East."

Martin suggested the resolutions will erode Jewish support for the NDP. "As a party, it will be hard to convince the general Jewish public that the NDP has a balanced view," he said.

An NDP spokesperson said the motions were called "emergency resolutions" because they were submitted after an end-of-June deadline for convention resolutions. (The war with Hezbollah began in mid-July.)

And though harsh in their critique of Israel, Martin acknowledged that they could have been worse, saying the resolutions were softened versions of even more strident positions that had been considered in draft proposals.

Among the language dropped from drafts at the convention was a call for an economic boycott of "apartheid" Israel.

A composite document that incorporated elements from seven resolutions proposed by six Ontario riding associations called on the party to support the right of return for all refugees and "a halt to military aid and economic trade with Israel."

The draft document also called on the party to "campaign for an end to the rule of apartheid laws that make Palestinians and Israeli Arabs second- and third-class citizens under occupation."

Martin said "there was a legitimate effort by our foreign affairs critic Alexa McDonough to merge the resolutions and in the process delete some of the more absurdly volatile language in the resolutions... They failed in the task of trying to stay moderate and balanced, where most NDP [members] feel comfortable."

The result is a "public perception that the NDP is anti-Israel, and I feel sick about it."

Winnipeg kashrut head has 20 years experience

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's new rabbinic kashrut administrator has ambitious goals: getting more companies under kashrut supervision and raising local supervisory standards.

Rabbi Mitchell Cohen said he'd like to see the Vaad Ha'ir of Winnipeg almost double the number of its accounts across Canada.

"We would like to have 200 accounts," he said. "We will be attending food trade shows as well as knocking on doors and talking to people about the benefit of having a kashrut certification."

The rabbi, who brings 20 years of experience in kashrut supervision to his new job, said he was attracted to Winnipeg by the challenge of helping a smaller Jewish community improve its kashrut standards. He took up his position Aug. 1.

Rabbi Cohen, 40, was born and raised in Chicago in an Orthodox environment. He received his smichah in 1990 from Hebrew Theological College in Chicago.

He said he began working as a junior field kashrut supervisor for the Chicago Rabbinical Council in 1986 (the CRC is the Chicago equivalent of the Vaad and is the largest kashrut agency in the U.S. Midwest).

"I worked part time for the CRC to help pay my tuition," he said. "The CRC is always looking for junior field supervisors."

During his rabbinical training, Rabbi Cohen also did an internship in a Jewish nursing home. After graduation, his first rabbinical position was director of pastoral care at a seniors home in Chicago, where his responsibilities also included supervising the kitchen and leading prayer services.

In 1995, he became executive director of rabbinical counselling for hospitals and Jewish nursing homes in the Chicago area.

Throughout his time working in nursing homes, he continued to work part time supervising kashrut for the CRC.

In 1998, Rabbi Cohen left Chicago for a pulpit at Congregation Beth Tefilah in London, Ont., which had about 85 member families. "I wanted a change after eight years of working in nursing homes," he said.

He quickly found that being a pulpit rabbi wasn't satisfying for him. "I felt a yearning to be doing kashrut work full time," he said.

In 1999, he became director of kashrut for the Vaad Ha'ir in Ottawa, where he served for five years. For the past two years, Rabbi Cohen has been a private kashrut consultant under the Toronto-based COR hechsher.

He was first interviewed by Winnipeg's Vaad three years ago. "I was the first rabbi interviewed by the Winnipeg Vaad when it started the process of finding a replacement for the now retired rabbinical kashrut supervisor [Rabbi Peretz Weizman]," he said. "The Vaad did its due diligence through an exhaustive search throughout North America in finding the right person for the community."

Rabbi Cohen praised the leadership of the Winnipeg Vaad, which administers the WK hechsher, for its "strong desire to raise local kashrut standards to the national level."

He began working with the Winnipeg Vaad in February on a consulting basis. "Eighty-five per cent of our major commercial accounts have been willing to accommodate themselves to our new standards," he says. "We are working with most of the others to get there, too. Only two or three accounts have refused to work with us."

He notes that he has established a good working relationship with both Winnipeg Lubavitch Chief Rabbi Avraham Altein and the community's Conservative rabbis.

Winnipeg CJA campaign begins — with drama

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second straight year, Winnipeg's Combined Jewish Appeal chose to kick off its annual campaign with an evening that featured theatre and music at a downtown nightclub – the kind of venue that appeals to young adults.

And this year's event, held on Sept. 7 (the Superweek telethon was Sept. 10 to 14) at the downtown club Alive in the District was a smashing success, with most of the 250 or so attendees being young adults in their 30s and early 40s,

It's a demographic group that's being targeted by the Winnipeg Jewish community's Grow Winnipeg initiative, which aims, in part, to keep young Jews in the city and encourage those who have left to return.

Before Israel's war with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon broke out in July, the CJA campaign goal for this year was $5 million, but because of war damage in northern Israel, Winnipeg has joined other Jewish communities around the world in raising additional funds for reconstruction. Thus far, the community has raised more than $2 million for its Israel Crisis Fund.

The CJA campaign kick-off featured photographer Keith Levitt's new photo exhibit about his recent journey to Ethiopia, where he photographed a group of Jewish families, then documented their aliyah to Israel and their absorption into the Jewish state.

Levitt's story, accompanied by his photos, was told by actor Robb Paterson portraying a photographer named Robert, a former Winnipegger now living in Toronto who made the same trip as the real photograher.

One scene saw Paterson as Robert talking by phone to his mother, Rose (portrayed by Debbie Maslowsky in another part of the room), who filled him in on family simchahs and his contemporaries who have moved back to Winnipeg from larger communities.

Robert tells his mother that he can't come for a bat mitzvah because he is going to Ethiopia and Israel.

Later in the evening, "Robert" delivered a monologue, as if he were addressing a CJA Young Adult Division gathering, in which he spoke in detail, supported by Levitt's photos, about his visit with the Ethiopians and their aliyah.

He described their primitive living conditions in Ethiopia, their preparations for aliyah (including a year-long study program in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital city, to prepare them for life in a modern country), their joyful reunions with family in Israel and the challenges of integrating into Israeli society.

"The kids adapt quickly," he said, "but it is very difficult for middle aged and older adults. Why do they come to Israel? It's because they want their kids to grow up in a safe Jewish environment where they will have a future. Despite the dangers of terrorism, none want to go back to Ethiopia."

He said his last stop in Israel was a school where 150 Jews from Ethiopia had just received law degrees.

Among the other dramatic vignettes was a monologue by actress Mairi Babb as a young Jewish Winnipegger with a good job offer in Calgary who explains that she chose to stay in Winnipeg after going on a community mission to Argentina, the source of 160 new Jewish immigrant families in Winnipeg over the past few years, and becoming impressed with the vitality and caring of her home community.

In her concluding remarks, event chairperson Sandra Secter noted that the evening's collection of dramatic stories were all about Jewish people overcoming obstacles to find homes and help each other. She said Levitt's photo exhibit will be on display at the Asper Jewish Community Campus for the next few months.

Divorce rates, marriage rules

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Q Is it true that the Divorce rate is 50%? Why do so many stay together? Have you yourself ever been divorced? If not, how did you and your wife manage to stay together?

A No. Actually, the divorce rate is only 39% among married Canadians, although people who only live together without actually marrying have a much higher rate of breakup: 70%. Also, in the United States the rate is actually about 50%.

Many attribute the American divorce rate to the moves people have to make across the country to keep their jobs or to find new ones, often leading to significant strains within their marriage. In Canada, our population is concentrated in a few major metropolitan areas, which greatly reduces the need to move in order to keep one's job or to find a new one.

It may well also be that Canada's culture lends itself more towards compromise, which is perhaps the most significant factor in keeping a couple together. People often ask if I am myself divorced, thinking that perhaps the experience will somehow make me wiser or empathetic to my clients. How so? Since when does an oncologist have to undergo chemotherapy in order to better treat his cancer patients? In any event, I am happy to report that, as you read this, my wife Rhonda and I are cruising through the Greek islands in celebration of our 25th wedding anniversary.

No, I have never been divorced. But I am no less empathetic to people who endure this horror. Quite the contrary: after 25 years of solving problems for separating couples, I can often spot quick solutions without confusing my personal battles with those of my clients. Furthermore, giving the lie to the popular stereotype of the divorce lawyer looking to score a huge settlement for his client, a conscientious family law lawyer will always seek the quickest and most amicable solution wherever possible. Even among those family law lawyers who are divorced, I know of very few who confuse personal issues with their legal practices. Twenty-five years have also taught me how to avoid becoming my own client.

In this vein, here are a few tips. If you're looking for absolute equality, sorry to disappoint you, but God gave different rules for the guys and the gals in marriage. If, like me, you've been married for a while, then none of this should be news to you. The rules are ancient and go back to Moses.

Rule #1. Marriage is not equal. Ladies come first. If you are smart, chivalry is how you eat, sleep and breathe. The role of husbands is to make their wives happy. Your reward, guys, is a life of bliss. When disagreements arise, agree with her; when she speaks, listen (don't just hear); help with everything (household and children); and never take her for granted.

Rule #2. There are no other Rules.

Rhonda and I, and all of us at Beard Winter, wish you and your family a good and healthy New Year.

Concordia student in critical condition

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Dollard des Ormeaux resident Leslie Markofsky, 22, was in very critical but stable condition at Montreal General Hospital earlier this week after suffering two bullet wounds to the head during the shooting spree at Dawson College.

Rabbi Ronnie Cahana of Congregation Beth El in Town of Mount Royal, where Markofsky celebrated his bar mitzvah and where the family still attends High Holy Day services, told The CJN that he visited the Markofskys in the hospital and described them as a "close and beautiful family."

A family member who answered the phone at Markofsky's home last week declined to speak to The CJN.

He reportedly remains in a deep coma, pending a decision by doctors on whether to try to remove a second bullet from his brain (another has already been removed).

Markofsky is a Concordia University business student who graduated from Dawson last spring. He had reportedly dropped by Dawson last Wednesday to visit friends for a lunch-hour pizza party.

The other members of Markofsky's family are his parents Jeffrey and Ida, and his twin sister Lauren.

Rabbi Cahana said last Friday that he planned to visit the hospital again.

"Please ask all of Israel to pray for him," the rabbi said. "His Hebrew name is Yechiel Lazar ben Ida."

Dawson student Joshua Perl was also injured in the incident, but less seriously.

Despite being shot by gunman Kimveer Gill, Perl felt guilty last week for running away from a fellow student who had been shot in the leg after Perl had heroically tried to shield her a few moments earlier.

Perl didn't even know her full name, but he thinks her first name was Lisa.

Perl said he and the girl appeared to be the only students left in the cafeteria who had not yet moved to the back of the large room to take cover in an area containing a pizzeria.

After he and the girl were shot, he stood up quickly and zigzagged his way to the rear.

Second Dawson victim recounts shooting nightmare

"He stopped shooting, so I just made a dash for it," he told The CJN in an interview last Thursday evening in his Freud Street home. "But I still feel guilty for leaving her. I felt responsible for her."

Perl was the centre of attention for his family – father Mordechai, mother Suzanne, sister Jessica and brother Nathaniel – last Thursday after being released following an overnight stay at east-end Jean Talon Hospital, where he was also questioned by two visiting police officers.

Friends and relatives dropped by his home all day to wish him well. His left arm, from close to his shoulder down to his hand, was bandaged in white, and he said two of his fingers – the pinkie and adjacent one – were numb. He was also prescribed an antibiotic and painkillers.

As it did for all Dawson students, last Wednesday started out routinely for Perl, a social sciences student.

He had missed his first "Introduction to Business" class, his French lab had been cancelled, and he went to the college's cafeteria at around 11:30 a.m. to meet some friends.

He was sitting near the front of the room, and a bit to the left, when he heard a "bang, bang, bang" sound, "like a firecracker."

Perl initially thought it was a prank, but everyone, including him, hit the floor and started to move toward the back of the room. When Perl looked over his left shoulder, he saw the gunman, bending over a table, armed with a "huge gun." Perl estimated that he was, at most, seven metres away.

"I didn't know what the hell was going on. I thought: 'This is like the States. This is crazy.'"

Gill, he said, was swearing, shouting and both firing randomly but also at times taking haphazard aim. The room was a cacophony of students screaming, shattering glass and ricocheting bullets.

Perl said he felt like a "moving target."

According to Perl, at one point, a police officer entered the room, aimed his gun directly at Gill and ordered him to drop his weapon.

Joshua Perl

"[Gill] said: 'I'm not dropping my weapon,' and the policeman turned and left."

Perl and the girl were shot after this, and Perl said he doesn't understand why the police left.

At the hospital, when he told police about the actions of the officer, "they didn't believe it," Perl said. But he said he was confident that surveillance tapes and the investigation by the Sûreté du Québec would confirm his version of events.

After Perl made his way to the back of the room, someone gave him a belt to use as a tourniquet. Once the gunman was dead – Perl estimated that everything happened in 15 minutes from start to finish – the students ran out of the the cafeteria and exited onto de Maisonneuve Boulevard. Perl said he was quickly escorted into an ambulance. He was mostly concerned about his loss of blood, since he was feeling extremely faint.

Meanwhile, friends and family were calling him on his cellphone in the ambulance. Some people he knew saw him on television being placed in an ambulance. Perl's sister, on her way back to Dawson after going to an appointment with her mother, went home. His parents, when they finally got to Jean Talon Hospital, were relieved to see him conscious and talking.

Perl said he had qualms about returning to school this week, but his father said he would be going back.

He said he didn't think he needs counselling.

"I just want to heal up," he said. "But I don't feel safe in that school anymore. I want to meet that girl."

His father said Perl was protected by God.

"It's a miracle nothing serious happened. God's hand was there."

'Oh my God, this is really happening!'

Jewish students recall fleeing Dawson shooting scene

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Philip Booth got his first cellphone last Wednesday evening, just hours after the fatal shooting rampage at Dawson College. His parents, who had balked at such a purchase previously, had no qualms this time.

Booth, a 17-year-old health sciences student, was seated in his H-wing English class at Dawson when he heard the sounds of shots coming from de Maisonneuve Boulevard. To Booth, though, the sounds registered more like "metal on metal" than the blunt crack of a firearm.

Reality sunk in quickly, however, when he and his classmates looked out the window, only to see a man wounded in the leg being carried to the south side of the street.

Seconds later, they saw another man collapse on the street, clutching his abdomen.

Within five minutes, "someone" came into the class and told everyone to evacuate immediately.

Booth and the others hurried out the door. They headed toward an emergency exit close to the end of the hallway and then down one flight of stairs to exit on de Maisonneuve near Wood Avenue.

Booth said he never heard any of the shots inside of the school, because his classroom was one floor up and a bit of a distance from the atrium where much of the shooting took place. Nor did he ever see the shooter, who was later identified as Kimveer Gill, a 25-year-old who had been caught up in nihilistic Goth youth culture and had posted images of himself brandishing a weapon on the vampirefreaks.com website.

As he and his classmates were evacuating, Booth shouted to people in other classrooms to get out.

At that moment, he said, reality sunk in. "I thought: 'Oh my God, this is really happening!'"

Booth scampered onto one of the last "Green line" Metro trains that ran through the heart of downtown before part of the line was shut down during the crisis, and he was back in his Monkland Avenue home in Notre Dame de Grâce 45 minutes later.

On the train, he said, people could see him visibly trembling. "They were looking at me and must have been wondering why this guy is shaking so much."

His grandparents were at home when he arrived. His grandfather, Sonny, who hadn't been aware of what was going on downtown, asked him why he was home so early.

The rest of the afternoon, Booth said, he received a "tidal wave" of phone calls from friends and family asking if he was safe.

Booth also left messages with his mother, Sheila Fishman, and father, Billy Booth, at work, as well as with others. "Everyone just wanted to make sure I was all right."

Orly Fruchter, co-president of Dawson Hillel, was nursing a bad cold in her fifth floor physics class when the shooting incident began.

Fruchter, 19, said she heard absolutely nothing from within the confines of her classroom. But after class, just as she was heading down the stairs for a meeting with her English teacher on the third floor, "a ton of students came running in," she recalled.

At the time, "I didn't even know what was happening," she said.

After being told about the shootings in the building, she joined crowds of students heading down the stairs and out the doors as police, in firm but calm command of the situation, exhorted everyone to get out and keep moving.

"Everything was very efficient," she said. "It took only seven minutes to get all the students out."

Fruchter exited Dawson on Sherbrooke Street at Wood Avenue. Once there, she saw a student who had been shot being treated. She said the students were all "rushed" to Ste. Catherine Street a safe distance away.

Like almost everyone else, Fruchter reached for her cellphone, only to find that the network was down. She wasn't able to reach her parents, Sylvia and Haim, until some 45 minutes later.

Fruchter said she was "pretty calm" throughout the ordeal and never heard actual gunshots since she was inside her class. Had she not been, she said, the acoustics of Dawson would have made the shots much more audible to her.

Fruchter said she's also been relatively calm in the aftermath of the incident, perhaps because she wasn't actually exposed to the shooter.

"I think it's probably going to hit me more when I get back" to school, she said.

Charbonneau out of UNESCO post

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Yvon Charbonneau has been recalled as Canada's ambassador to UNESCO (the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) as of Sept. 22, halfway through his four-year term

The former Montreal Liberal MP's appointment to the Paris-based post by Prime Minister Paul Martin in August 2004 was controversial.

Then-Conservative foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day questioned the appointment because of the former Quebec union leader's strongly anti-Zionist views and remarks about Jews in the past.

Charbonneau, who headed the provincial teachers' federation in the 1970s and '80s, was once denounced as "an enemy of the Jewish people" by then Quebec MNA Herbert Marx. Former prime minister Brian Mulroney later said Charbonneau had spoken of certain prominent Montreal Jews in "a decidedly racist way."

Charbonneau has been critical of Israel in recent years. In a House of Commons speech in 2002, he referred to the "terror campaign waged by Israel" and accused the Sharon government of "turning Israel into a rogue state" for its retaliation against Palestinian suicide bombings.

Charbonneau reportedly commented that his firing from UNESCO, of which he was informed Aug. 31, was politically motivated.

"I was named by Mr. Martin and now there has been a change of government – I think everybody understands," he said. "If it is not politics it would be a professional fault, but there has never been a professional fault brought to my attention. On the contrary, everybody has congratulated me."

Foreign affairs department spokesperson Marie Christine Lilkoff said she could not comment on the matter, except to say that Charbonneau's was a "political appointment"and that it "may be revoked at any time by the government."

Olmert appoints commission on war

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — A month after the Lebanon war ended in a tentative truce, Israel has embarked on a public reckoning.

The cabinet on Sunday approved Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's choice for a commission of inquiry into the 34-day offensive against Hezbollah, which left many Israelis feeling that national security is worse off.

"I very much hope that the panel will complete its work in the near future, as soon as possible, and will assist the State of Israel in better preparing for the challenges that await us," Olmert said.

But Olmert's critics, including hundreds of army reservists who served in Lebanon and accuse his government and the military top brass of incompetence, cried foul.

Headed by retired Supreme Court justice Eliyahu Winograd, the panel also includes two leading jurists and former army generals. It is empowered by law to subpoena witnesses and grant them immunity from prosecution.

Yet that authority is undercut, in many Israelis' eyes, by the fact that the commission was appointed by the very people it might be expected to scrutinize – Olmert and his defence minister, Amir Peretz.

Reservists groups and public watchdogs such as the Movement for Quality Government had called for the Supreme Court to set up an independent probe that could, in theory, cause a major shakeup in Jerusalem.

The Lebanon war cost 157 Israeli lives without delivering the promised definitive victory over Hezbollah.

The Lebanese militia's backers, Syria and Iran, are perceived by many as having been bolstered by their proxy's fortitude against the Middle East's mightiest military.

The Lebanon campaign cost 157 Israeli lives

The government says a quarter of Hezbollah's gunmen were killed and half of its rockets used or destroyed in the fighting.

Many in the Jewish state liken the Lebanon campaign's disappointments to the 1973 Yom Kippur War, when Israeli forces were battered in a surprise attack by Egypt and Syria. After that conflict, an independent commission delivered recommendations that led to the resignation of then-prime minister Golda Meir, her chief of military staff, David Elazar, and another top general.

Olmert has argued that Israel could not afford an independent inquiry, as it would take too long to issue its findings and breed recrimination rather than co-operation in the effort to prepare for future threats.

But it was not clear whether the so-called Winograd Commission would be any more expeditious. Cabinet secretary Yisrael Maimon told reporters that there was "no time frame" for the panel's work.

Protesters gathered outside the Prime Minister's Office marched bearing effigies of Olmert and Peretz on a stretcher. Another group held a sign reading, "Only an ass can't tell the Winograd Commission is a whitewash."

An opposition lawmaker vowed to work for a Knesset majority to set up an independent inquiry, in which case, under law, the Winograd Commission would have to disband.

"Some of the reservists are saying, 'When it comes to investigating some of the events, we won't be co-operating with a commission that was set up by the very government that was such a failure in waging the war,'" Gilad Erdan, a senior member of the Likud party, told Israel Radio.

"The prime minister must prove that his considerations in the execution of the war were relevant, rather than partisan. This cloud of doubt must be dispersed."

Olmert angered many right-wingers during the fighting by saying that he was confident the offensive would strengthen his government's hand in carrying out planned withdrawals from the West Bank. But in the aftermath of the war, the prime minister has had to shelve his vision of unilateral territorial concessions to the Palestinians.

Many Israelis feel especially aggrieved by a final and bloody ground offensive ordered by Olmert after he had agreed, in principle, to the Aug. 14 cease-fire. Thirty-three soldiers died in those two days.

"That was a spin move. It had no substantive security-political goal, only a spin goal. It was meant to supply the missing victory picture," the former chief of staff, Moshe Ya'alon, told Ha'aretz.

Campaign launched to expel Iran from UN

By HILARY LEILA KRIEGER
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs (JCPA) announced last week that it had enlisted Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel and internationally renowned lawyers Irwin Cotler and Alan Dershowitz in its campaign to expel Iran from the United Nations.

The JCPA will be circulating a document at the UN calling for Iran's ouster based on the UN charter, which says member states "that have persistently violated the principles contained in the present charter" can be removed.

The JCPA maintains that Iran has violated the convention against genocide by its threats to Israel and pursuit of nuclear weapons, as well as abrogated the foundational charter's requirement that member countries "refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state."

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has indicated he plans to address the UN General Assembly in the near future, even as the United States considers imposing sanctions for Iran's pursuit of a nuclear program.

"The United Nations was established in the aftermath of the Second World War by member states who were determined to never let the crimes that had just occurred ever happen again," said Dore Gold, president of the JCPA and a former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations. "The UN had a dismal record in the 1990s countering acts of genocide in Rwanda and Bosnia, and therefore we view this call for taking the genocide convention seriously as an opportunity for the UN to redress the errors of the past."

Though expelling a member nation would be highly atypical for the UN, Gold noted that there was precedent for such a step, citing the exclusion of South Africa when it was an apartheid regime.

EU: PA unity alone won't open coffers

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The Hamas-Fatah agreement to form a national unity government is not enough for the Europeans to begin channeling money back into the Palestinian Authority, a senior European diplomat told the Jerusalem Post last week, a day before the EU's foreign ministers were to meet in Brussels to discuss the issue.

The diplomat also called on Israel to unilaterally release a large number of Palestinian prisoners to "improve the overall atmosphere" and possibly strengthen the position of the moderates inside the PA.

U.S. President George W. Bush, meanwhile, joined a meeting at the White House between Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. No details of the discussion were immediately available, but the Palestinian issue was at the top of the agenda Livni took to Washington.

According to the senior European diplomat, if – as Israel has said - there was to be no linkage between releasing Palestinian prisoners and the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, then the prisoners could be released before Shalit was freed in an effort to dramatically change the atmosphere.

"What is needed is a bold move that would force a breakthrough in attitudes and get people to climb down from their trees," he said, adding that such a move would provide Israel with a dramatic "public relations coup."

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the cabinet earlier this week he had intended to release prisoners before Shalit was kidnapped in June, but that the idea has since been shelved.

Regarding the PA unity government, the European official characterized it as "a gesture in the right direction. It is an acknowledgement that there is a problem, but it is not a true step. It is hot air and mirrors."

Meanwhile, PA cabinet ministers from Hamas handed in their resignations to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, a step toward forming a unity government, a government official said.

The next step would be Haniyeh's handing in his resignation to PA President Mahmoud Abbas, who would then pick a candidate to form a new government – probably Haniyeh.

The European official said that he had not seen a written text of the proposed unity government's political program, but "there has not been one single indication that any one of the three conditions would be fulfilled, not even a commitment to stop using violence."

The three conditions he referred to were the international community's benchmarks for granting legitimacy to Hamas: renouncing terrorism, recognizing Israel's right to exist and accepting previous agreements.

He said that all the Hamas-Fatah agreement really indicated was that Hamas "is now pretty desperate to get the money flowing from European countries. Some European countries are said to have told the Palestinians that if they go to a unity government the money will start up again, but I don't think that is true."

He said he did not feel the EU would alter its current cold-shoulder policy toward the PA unless there was a "formal commitment and proof on the ground that they will stop all violence, stop brandishing weapons, stop talking about suicide bombings, stop exalting the 72 maidens waiting for the 'martyrs.'"

He also said that he did not believe the EU would accept a national unity government by itself as a breakthrough.

The official's comment came in contrast to remarks made by Hamas officials in the media to the effect that the EU had promised to end its economic sanctions once a unity government was set up. Finland, which holds the rotating presidency of the EU, issued a statement "welcoming" the announcement of the agreement on the formation of a government of national unity and calling it a "positive development." But neither that statement nor any other public EU statement said that the very formation of the unity government would break the EU's economic embargo of the PA.

In the Foreign Ministry, meanwhile, the consensus was that a national unity government would enable the Europeans to meet with PA ministers not affiliated with Hamas, a move that could lead to a European decision to restart the money flow down the road. But senior officials in the ministry said the Europeans would most likely condition the flow of money on a Hamas ceasefire.

Livni, meanwhile, started her week-long visit to the United States with talks aimed at urging that country not to help the new PA government unless it accepted the three international benchmarks.

The United States, according to diplomatic sources, saw eye to eye with Israel on this issue.

While Livni was carrying a message of the Olmert government's willingness to begin high-level talks with Abbas, she will also warn of a possible shift in the world public opinion in favor of talking to the Hamas-led PA.

Speaking to an AIPAC leadership group, Livni said the international community's three benchmarks for granting Hamas legitimacy were not negotiable.

"There is no place for any negotiation about Israel's very right to exist as a homeland for the Jewish people; this is the very basis of our presence here," she said. Regarding the war in Lebanon, she said that one of its outcomes was the realization in the international community that the Iranian threat was real. She said it was clear to the world that Hezbollah was not promoting the interests of the Lebanese, but rather the Iranian interest of opening a front with Israel and "preventing and hampering all efforts to achieve diplomatic progress."

Public opinion as instrument of Arab foreign policy

By BARRY RUBIN

Commentary

To understand what is going on now in the Middle East, and in Western perceptions of the region, it is a revelation to recall the brilliant prophesy made by Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Shara in January 2000.

Shara was discussing Syrian strategy in negotiations with Israel which were about to reach their culmination. A few weeks later, then-president Bill Clinton met then-Syrian president Hafez Assad in Switzerland. Clinton offered Assad the return of all the Golan Heights in exchange for peace with Israel. Assad turned him down. A few months after that, Assad died and Bashar Assad replaced his father and has followed a radical course (though often being falsely credited with the opposite) ever since.

Syria and the PLO did not reverse their historic policy of seeking Israel's destruction. What they did do, however, was reverse their rhetoric about that goal. In 1967, Arab states openly declared their refusal to negotiate with Israel, make peace with Israel, or accept its existence. In 1974, the PLO adopted a two-stage strategy: first, get a Palestinian state, and then use it as a base for achieving total victory.

Up to the 1993 Oslo agreement, however, the PLO only paid lip service (though, in dealing with much of the West, even the most minimal fig leaf suffices) to this plan. Arafat moved it into an operational mode, however, but it would be left to Shara to articulate it publicly with the greatest clarity.

In his January 2000 speech to the Syrian Writers' Union, Shara opened on a pessimistic note. After their defeat in the 1967 war the Arabs seemed to be "really cornered and faced with one of two choices. Either we have to accept a peace that is akin to capitulation and surrender, which can never be the peace we want, or we have to reject peace without a solid ground on which to base this rejection."

"Surrender" meant any compromise peace agreement which secured Israel's existence even if it paid for that privilege by giving up the territory captured in 1967 and accepting an independent Palestinian state. Rejecting peace without a solid basis meant just sounding extremist by preaching perpetual war on Israel.

For decades, Arab states had publicly insisted they would never make peace with Israel. After Egypt did so in the late 1970s, every regime tried to prove it was not a traitor like then-Egytian president Anwar Sadat. Then Arafat made a deal in 1994 and Jordan signed a peace treaty thereafter. The old position was not just untenable, it was recognized as a public relations' disaster.

Here is how Shara put it prophetically in 2000, a few days before Syria rejected getting its land back through the peace process:

"If we do not get our land through the peace process, we will win the world and Arab public. For Israel has continued to claim that it is always with peace and that the Arabs are against it. True, the media are directed against us and are in favour of the enemy to a large extent, but it is possible to penetrate these mighty, hostile media… Our strong, solid, and persistent position and the reaffirmation of our constants in a convincing way are bound to have an effect."

In other words, as long as the Arab side explicitly rejects peace, Israel will have the diplomatic and media advantage. What must be done is to say the Arabs were ready for peace, to repeat demands and so, "in a convincing way," persuade the international community that Israel was at fault for the conflict since it rejected these demands.

When Israel did offer almost everything the Arabs sought, new, other issues were found to explain why the Arabs said "no." Such issues include the Palestinian demand that all refugees should return to Israel (where they can sabotage it from within). Then there are always tiny, forgotten pieces of territory as with the Hezbollah claim that Israel is occupying a small piece of Lebanon (Shebaa Farms) which everyone else (including Syria) regards as Syrian territory; or the Syrian demand for Israeli land illegally occupied by Syria in 1948 which would give Damascus a claim on Israel's main water source.

There is always the pretext of prisoners being held by Israel (those who committed the last round of terrorist attacks) or quibbling over language. Has Hamas recognized Israel's right to exist? Well it has, maybe, perhaps, sort of implicitly, hinted, if you read between the lines and ignore what Hamas leaders say in Arabic to the contrary.

"A strong argument is important in the media," said Shara back in 2000. "We only want our land and rights. They are the ones who are exposed now because they want to keep the land."

And so six years after Israel offered to give up all the land it captured in 1967 it is possible to persuade the world that… Israel has not offered to do so. Immediately after Israel withdraws from all the Gaza Strip and proposed large withdrawals from the West Bank, much of the Western media and even governments was convinced that the problem is that Israel is still an occupier.

No wonder Shara concluded, "So, in either case, we will not lose."

With Arab regimes insisting they did want peace – but avoiding any irreversible step in that direction – the world's diplomats beat a path to their door. Even after Arafat and Syria rejected peace in 2000, an Arab leader merely had to say he wanted peace, with whatever subtle qualifications or differences between English-language flexibility for Western ears coupled with Arabic intransigence for the folks at home – and the onus was put on Israel for the failure to make a breakthrough.

It was the diplomatic equivalent of shampoo bottle instructions to repeat application even though rinsing one time was enough. This immediately doubled consumption of the product: a tiny linguistic amendment that made all the difference in the world.

Postwar Germany ordains first rabbis

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — For the first time in the postwar era, rabbis are being ordained in Germany.

In a ceremony in Dresden, rabbis Daniel Alter, Tomas Kucera and Malcolm Matitiani received their ordination Sept. 14 from the Abraham Geiger College for the Training of Rabbis for Europe.

Many see the ordinations as part of a postwar resurgence of Judaism in Germany.

The country's Jewish population has more than quadrupled since 1990 thanks to the influx of former Soviet Jews. That led to the building of new synagogues and Jewish schools.

This fall, a new Jewish community centre will open in Munich, symbolizing what many see as a new willingness of Jews in postwar Germany to come out of hiding.

Meanwhile, the need for a seminary is urgent, with about 20 rabbis spread out over more than 80 congregations. In 1999, the Central Council of Jews in Germany lent its support to the Geiger College.

"We urgently need rabbinical leadership," Jan Muehlstein, chair of the Union of Progressive Jews in Germany, told JTA by e-mail. The new rabbis will help "close the gap created by the Shoah, a gap that is painfully evident, even more so today as we lose the last generation of rabbis who personally were connected with prewar Jewish life in Germany."

In 1836, Abraham Geiger, a founder of Reform Judaism, called for the establishment of a Jewish theological department at a German university. This inspired the founding of the Jewish Theological Seminary in Breslau in 1854 and the Higher Institute for Jewish Studies in Berlin in 1870. The Nazis shut down both institutions.

The Abraham Geiger College for the Training of Rabbis for Europe, which opened six years ago, is affiliated with the World Union for Progressive Judaism and is an institute at the University of Potsdam, just outside Berlin.

The ordination is being hosted by the central council and the Jewish community of Dresden. Guests at the New Synagogue in Dresden will include Jewish, Christian and Muslim leaders.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel has called the event a "day of recognition and joy" as well as "a moment of hope that these first rabbis" will be "followed by many more."

The three graduates expressed excitement.

"I am always surprised when people say I am going to be one of the first three," Kucera said in an interview earlier this summer.

The public event pales in comparison to "the new life that is coming for me," said Kucera, 36, who will serve Beth Shalom, a liberal Jewish congregation in Munich.

Kucera left his native Czech Republic in 1989 and earned a doctorate in biochemistry in Germany, followed by a research residency in Nashville. There he "saw the spectrum of Jewish life" and was drawn to it.

He entered Abraham Geiger College in 2002. Kucera's rabbinical dissertation focuses on abortion and the Jewish concept of the soul.

Science and religion go together, he says: "When I was younger, I tried to separate the two."

His greatest immediate challenge will be "just to know all the people" in his congregation, "to listen to their needs. They never had a full-time rabbi."

In the long term, he hopes to learn "how to attract people to the synagogue who somehow identify as Jews but don't come to services," and eventually even to help with matchmaking.

Matitiani, 38, left the kitchen to become a rabbi. Living in Pretoria, South Africa, he had a successful catering business, but he also was teaching bar mitzvah students and leading services at his synagogue. When the congregants needed a rabbi, they asked him to fill in.

Now he will become one of two rabbis at South Africa's largest progressive congregation, Temple Israel of Cape Town, serving some 1,000 families.

"It has been a long road, and it will be nice when I have that piece of paper, that title," he said in an interview at the college this summer. "I was always referred to as a 'student rabbi.'"

"And the congregants will also be happy," added Matitiani, who has shuttled between South Africa and Germany. "They have gone through the process with me. In a sense, I've got an extended family."

The congregation reflects "the rainbow nature of South Africa," he added. "With apartheid over, it's not illegal to cross race boundaries, so we have many conversions and marriages. It's wonderful," said Matitiani, whose dissertation deals with midrashic views on intermarriage.

Alter, 47, was born in Germany -- his parents met at a Displaced Persons camp near Nuremberg. He will move to Oldenburg, where Alter will serve some 330 members. He also will continue to serve a small congregation at Delmenhorst, with about 250 members. In both towns, he has been serving as a student rabbi.

Alter's interest in Judaism was sparked by a sermon of Rabbi Eli Seidmann, a former U.S. Army chaplain in Germany. The theme was "Keep your eye on the ball!" Alter recalled.

"The whole sermon was built on this baseball term. And I was a huge sports fan," he said. The sermon "made it clear to me what was missing from my life," said Alter, whose family was "not very religious."

Israel Briefs

Arab MKs praise Hezbollah

On a visit to Beirut, three Arab members of Israel's Knesset praised Hezbollah's "resistance" to Israel. The three MKs told Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora that Hezbollah had "lifted the spirit of the Arab people," the Jerusalem Post reported – despite the fact Hezbollah missiles killed a disproportionately high number of Israeli Arabs during this summer's war. On a prior stop in Syria, Balad Party MKs Azmi Bishara, Jamal Zahalka and Wasal Taha claimed that Israel was likely to attack Syria. Some Israeli legislators say the trio's visit is treasonous, while commentators noted it contributes to suspicions that Israeli Arabs are a fifth column. Attorney General Menachem Mazuz had opened an investigation.

Maps blamed for strike

Israeli officials said the bombing of a UN post in southern Lebanon this summer – in which four UN peacekeepers were killed, including one Canadian – was caused by faulty maps. The Israeli Air Force hit a UN outpost in a July 26 strike in Lebanon, drawing harsh criticism from UN Secretary General Kofi Annan, who accused Israel of deliberately targeting UN forces. An Israeli report said the strike was aimed at a Hezbollah outpost some 150 metres from the UN base but that incorrectly marked maps led to the mishap, Ha'aretz reported. The United Nations is reportedly conducting its own investigation.

Lebanon to sue Israel

Lebanon is planning to sue Israel over an oil spill that occurred during the Israel-Hezbollah war. Israel's Army Radio reported that the suit would be filed at the International Court of Justice in The Hague. Lebanon's environment minister said Israeli airstrikes caused the spill.

Olmert spoke to Indonesia

Ehud Olmert told the heads of a U.S. Jewish group visiting Israel that he had direct contact with Indonesian leaders during Israel's Lebanon war. Olmert said Indonesian leaders contacted Israel during the war. He did not divulge details of the conversation, but Israel subsequently dropped objections to Indonesian participation in a peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon. Israel has no formal relations with the world's most populous Muslim nation, but ties have warmed in recent years, and Israel delivered aid during the 2004 tsunami.

Amnesty raps Hezbollah

Amnesty International said Hezbollah's rocket attacks on Israel were war crimes. The London-based human rights group issued a 15-page report detailing the damage caused by some 4,000 rockets fired into Israel by the Lebanese militia during the recent war. "The scale of Hezbollah's attacks on Israeli cities, towns and villages, the indiscriminate nature of the weapons used and statements from the leadership confirming their intent to target civilians make it all too clear that Hezbollah violated the laws of war," Amnesty's secretary-general, Irene Khan, wrote.

Israeli schools fail

The Israeli school system ranks among the worst in the developed world in several categories, a new study found. "Education at a Glance 2006," published by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, found that Israeli teachers earn the fourth-lowest salaries, Israeli classrooms are among the most crowded and the average number of years Israeli schoolchildren go to school is among the lowest of the 32 OECD member and partner states surveyed between 1995 and 2004.

Shalit alive, in Gaza: IDF

A senior IDF official said last week that kidnapped soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit was being kept in the Gaza Strip and was in Hamas hands. The official speculated that Shalit had transformed from an asset to a burden, both on the Palestinian people and on the Hamas leadership, and therefore the group was interested in ending the affair. The official also emphasized that Khaled Meshaal, the Damascus-based head of Hamas, has the final word on the issue.

Orthopedic surgery chair launched at Sunnybrook

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Marvin Tile regarded as an international leader in the field

Dr. Marvin Tile, the recently retired head of orthopedic surgery at Toronto's Sunnybrook Hospital, has been honoured by the establishment of the Dr. Marvin Tile Chair in Orthopedic Surgery.

Tile, regarded as an international leader in the field of orthopedic surgery, has held many positions at the hospital. He founded the trauma program there and was the board chair of the Sunnybrook Foundation.

Dr. Marvin Tile

The co-founder of the Tile chair is the University of Toronto, where Tile served as a faculty member for many years. Dr. Hans Kreder currently holds the chair.

The chair was endowed by former patients of Tile and with grants from the Orthopaedic and Arthritic Foundation and the Hansjorg Wyss Foundation. Interest from the fund will be used to support academic activities such as the recruitment and retention of internationally competitive clinicians, clinician researchers and scientists to foster advances in orthopedic surgery.

Tile has served as a professor in the department of surgery at the University of Toronto faculty of medicine, founding president and then president of the Canadian Orthopaedic Association, president of the International Society for the Study of the Lumbar Spine, and president of the AO Foundation, a non-profit organization dedicated to improving the care of patients with musculoskeletal injuries based in Davos, Switzerland.

Although Tile is officially retired, he retains the positions of consultant orthopedic surgeon at Sunnybrook, professor of surgery at U of T, head of the governing council of the Sunnybrook Foundation, editor-in-chief of AO Dialogue in Zurich, and consultant to Ontario's Workerplace Safety and Insurance Tribunal.

Toronto-born, Tile is a graduate of the University of Toronto School of Medicine and has spent nearly his whole professional life at Sunnybrook Medical Centre. One of his proudest accomplishments is the establishment of the trauma unit at the hospital, which treats those with injuries caused by accidents. Since it opened in 1976, the unit's caseload has grown from 70 to 1,000.

Tile has helped develop similar trauma units in Israel, at Hadassah, Seroka, Rambam and Tel Hashomer hospitals. These centres help car accident victims as well as victims of terrorism.

Tile has lectured and taught in many countries, including Germany, South Africa, Brazil, Chile and Argentina.

His wife, Esther, has a large family in Israel, and they visit there often. This also gives them a chance to renew acquaintances with some of the medical researchers and clinicians who have worked with Tile at Sunnybrook.

His activities since his retirement are not entirely in the medical field. In fact, he has recently become the chair of the Holy Blossom Temple Foundation, succeeding Judy Nyman.

Tile's wife was the first of the family to become active at the synagogue. They and their four sons celebrated their life-cycle events there, and the family gradually became increasingly active at the temple.

"[Holy Blossom's Senior] Rabbi John Moscowitz started to put me on committees," Tile said, and when Nyman decided she could no longer chair the foundation, he was asked to take over.

Tile said the temple needs to raise a good deal of money, and so, together with the temple's board, he is "trying to organize the effort along effective philanthropic lines." Among his ideas are a planned giving program, "a renewal of the spirit of giving," as he put it.

Esther has been an important part of the Out of the Cold program at the temple, as well as the Mazon program.

This month marks Holy Blossom's 150th anniversary, and a wide variety of programs are planned, including the donation of a new sefer Torah next May. Celebrations will kick off with a special service in the sanctuary, followed by an outdoor festival. There will be speakers, musical and social events, historical exhibits and an anniversary concert at Roy Thomson Hall featuring the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Both Tiles will take an active part in the proceedings.

Tile said he is fascinated by the evolution of the synagogue, from a yeshiva-like institution to the centre of Jewish life.

"Some like a shtiebl," he mused. "I like it to be big – you can contribute so much."

Thriller questions modern anti-terror methods

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mon Colonel, a taut French political thriller launched at this year's Toronto International Film Festival, is set in Algeria 50 years ago, but it brings to mind jarring contemporary events, particularly the western counter-insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan and the related war on terrorism.

Directed with panache by Laurent Herbiet, this gritty film turns on the counter-insurgency waged by the French army in Algeria in the 1950s, but the pointed questions it raises are really about the here and now.

The film opens with a literal bang.

Raoul Duplan, a retired colonel who fought the Algerian rebels in their war of independence, is gunned down in cold blood in his home by an unknown assassin.

The killer sends the police the diary of Guy Rossi, a young, earnest lieutenant who served under Duplan and disappeared under mysterious circumstances.

The diary is an account of Rossi's wrenching experiences in Algeria, a French colony since the 1830s, and his reactions to the guerrilla war that engaged France for about a decade.

Mon Colonel, filmed on location in Algeria, swings back and forth between the present and the past.

Rossi (played by Robinson Stevenin), a 23-year-old law student with vaguely leftish views, is torn between his loyalty to France and his obeisance to the rule of law as he participates in "pacification" operations aimed at breaking the back of the rebel uprising.

When the colonel (Olivier Gourmet), a tough-as-nails, no-nonsense soldier, tries to manipulate him into providing a legal justification for his questionable methods against them, Rossi recoils in horror.

The film, which is never less than absorbing, impels a viewer to consider issues ranging from torture to civil liberties in the wider context of terrorism.

Reminiscent of The Battle of Algiers in terms of its contents, intensity and superb performances, Mon Colonel is an intelligent, thought-provoking film bound to trigger debate about the current Muslim insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Israeli director of Sweet Mud strikes gold

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dror Shaul, the Israeli director and scriptwriter of Sweet Mud, had a fine time at this year's Toronto International Film Festival.

The buzz for his gentle coming-of-age movie was encouraging and journalists sought him out.

But the best was yet to come. Last week, Sweet Mud, nominated for 10 Israeli Academy Awards, won in four categories: best picture, music, art and sound.

The film, which had its North American première at the festival, is scheduled to open in Israel later this year.

Set on a kibbutz in the 1970s and turning on a sensitive boy's poignant relationship with his mentally unstable mother, it is extremely close to Shaul's heart. As he put it, "It's not an entirely true story, but it is true that the film emerged from the same land in which my childhood memories are now buried."

Shaul, 35, was born and raised in Kibbutz Kissufim, which is adjacent to the Gaza Strip. "It's a really hot spot today, what with all the bombs and stuff," he said, referring to the Qassam rockets that Palestinian militants in Gaza have fired at Israeli settlements along the border since 2001.

When Shaul was a lad, Gaza was reasonably quiet and life on the kibbutz could be carefree.

"It was fantastic," he said in an interview. "There was a sense of community. There were open fields and amazing views. There was a feeling of pride in our accomplishments and, as kibbutzniks, in being 'the chosen people.'"

But there was a dark side as well.

Kibbutz ideology was based on the principles of equality and mutual assistance, and members could contribute as much as possible and receive as much as they required.

Director Dror Shaul directs two young actors in Sweet Mud.

Yet, as Shaul noted, the kibbutz was closed, bound by rigid rules and could be spiritually suffocating to weaker members.

Shaul's unstable and sometimes mentally ill mother was one such person, and he has yet to forgive the kibbutz for treating her unjustly.

Still, it took him years to pluck up the courage to write a screenplay. Although the script is basically faithful to the facts, Shaul took some artistic liberties.

"It's not entirely accurate in terms of sequence of events, nor does it take place in one year or on one kibbutz," he said.

But in all other respects, the film is factual.

Shaul's mother, who was originally from Tel Aviv, was certifiably unstable. "She had her ups and downs," he said. And as in Sweet Mud, she had a long-distance romance with a Swiss gentile.

Her husband, who died before Shaul was born, was an American from New York City, and was related to Yisrael Gallili, an influential cabinet minister and confidant of Zionist icon Golda Meir.

Shaul shot the film, with a $1.8 million (US) budget, over a 33-day period, using three different kibbutzim as locales.

"Making it was a long and exhaustive process. I wanted to make a film about the longing for warmth and emotions."

He conducted a meticulous, sometimes frustrating search for the lead actor, Tomer Steinhof, who portrays the boy and anchors the film on firm ground.

"I saw 1,800 kids before meeting Tomer. I thought he didn't have the 'look' of the character, but I fell in love with him. He could bring up emotions, and he was brilliant."

Shaul, who normally earns a living as a director of television commercials, left the kibbutz in 1990 after finishing his tour of military duty as a paratrooper. He left over a dispute concerning a job assignment. The kibbutz wanted to shift him to the orchard, but he preferred driving a cotton-picking machine.

By that juncture, he was already disillusioned with the kibbutz, which has since become a moshav.

"The idea of equality didn't work. It never really existed," said Shaul, who has since returned on brief visits. "The weak are the weak and the strong are the strong."

After leaving the kibbutz, he landed a position as a production assistant in the film industry. In 1999, he wrote and directed his first short, Operation Grandma, a comedy.

Shaul's first feature film, Sima Vaknin, Witch, was released in 2003.

Today, he is working on a new film, but would rather not talk about it at this early stage.

But after his triumph at the Israeli Oscars last week, Shaul's prospects certainly seem much brighter.

Memoir recalls 10-year-old's experience in WWII

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

When Kitty Wintrob enrolled in a creative writing workshop with her daughter some 20 years ago, she didn't imagine she would end up writing a full-length memoir.

After receiving enthusiastic praise in the workshop for her writing, Wintrob enrolled in a second workshop, then a third. She ultimately kept taking one workshop after another for more than a decade until her memoir was finished.

For various reasons, the completed manuscript lay in a drawer for years until recently, when her husband and daughter had it published privately as a birthday surprise for her.

Titled I'm Not Going Back, the 132-page book tells the story of Wintrob's experiences as a 10-year-old girl in London's Jewish East End during World War II. Evacuated to a cold and loveless foster home in the countryside, she sneaks back to her mother in London and refuses to leave her side even as the German bombing intensifies.

I'm Not Going Back is not just a story for girls. It's a gripping and well-balanced tale told from the heart and written with maturity and sensitivity.

Wintrob composed most of it on a typewriter at her kitchen table, splashing each page with memorable personalities, concrete images and tactile sensations. Her writing style allows for easy visualization, which seems especially noteworthy for someone who lost her eyesight years ago through macular degeneration.

Wintrob generally gives careful thought to each day's intended composition before sitting down at the computer that she now uses instead of a typewriter. "I spend a few hours at night, thinking about what I want to write, and in the morning I more or less know," she said. "I very seldom revise."

A couple of publishers expressed interest in the memoir but asked for changes that she felt would damage the fabric of the tale. In the meantime, buoyed by the favourable reception she's received from friends, she's been writing more stories, including one that is ostensibly a sequel to the one just published.

I'm Not Going Back ends with the girl and her mother being forced by an air-raid siren to the shelter of St. Paul's tube station with hordes of other displaced residents, as bombs begin to fall. The closing sentence reads, "By the time we got to our places at St. Paul's, I knew that one thing was for sure: from now on until the end of the bombing, this platform would be our bed."

The sequel begins the following morning, after a harrowing night of bombs raining down on the city. "Everything outside was burning, and we had to walk home because there was no transportation," she recalls. "We walked right through the city of London, through the Bank, Aldgate, High Street, right down Whitechapel Road to Brick Lane, right down Brick Lane to my street, and right down my street. A lot of the houses on the street were destroyed."

Having received an indirect hit, her family home was badly damaged. "The great fire of London" is how Wintrob refers to the event, which occurred in 1941. Amidst the rubble she recalls finding two delicate figurines, a bride and bridegroom from a wedding-cake, that once stood atop her piano.

Wintrob has visited Eitz Chaim Day Schools and other schools where, with the help of an instructor or friend, her memoir was read aloud. Afterward, she answered the children's questions. The reception is always enthusiastic, so much so that Wintrob said it has inspired her back into a regular writing routine.

A school secretary in postwar London, she decided to try living in Canada for two years, during which she worked briefly for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in Toronto. What ultimately persuaded her to return here was her blooming relationship with Ralph Wintrob, then a CBC newswriter in Toronto, whom she married in 1959.

Now a retired teacher, Ralph Wintrob is active in the city's arts community and often lectures on Jewish literary subjects. Their daughter Suzanne Wintrob is also involved in the literary world, being a professional writer and editor.

While I'm Not Going Back is not yet available commercially, it's probably only a matter of time before a smart publisher grabs the rights and gets it into print.

Canadian actor starred in Russian prison drama

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

There's one awards show you likely missed this year. The Monte Carlo Television Awards, a prestigious Emmy-style awards show that recognizes the best in TV from all over the world, isn't shown in Canada, so here's a little recap.

In the award for best actor in a drama the nominees were Kiefer Sutherland from 24, Matthew Fox from Lost and Adam Tsekhman from Zola. The first two names should sound familiar, but the last?

Only in Russia, where Tsekhman played an American who was wrongly imprisoned for raping a young girl, on that country's most popular TV show, would his name be familiar. To people in North America, Tsekhman is a Winnipeg-born actor who recently graduated from Columbia in New York and is currently looking for work like so many other performers. But unlike his fellow actors, Tsekhman can say he lost to Kiefer Sutherland at a major European awards show.

Adam Tsekhman

"Getting nominated was amazing, but it was really wonderful to be in that environment for five or six days," says Tsekhman on the phone from New York. "The [Monaco] royal family puts money into the festival, so [as a nominee] I got to the royal palace, I got to meet Prince Albert. It was six days of being in a dream world."

Zola, a prison drama, was not only critically acclaimed but it also sparked a major controversy that ended with two real-life inmates almost killing themselves.

"The producers were getting letters from prison guards around Russia saying their representation of them was too harsh, that they don't treat prisoners harshly, and maybe they should sit in prisons and see how it is.

"Eventually the show was moved," he says. "It was the most popular drama on TV, on every night between eight and nine, but it became an issue and the government, who owns the TV station, moved it to 11:30 at night. Prisoners weren't allowed to watch it [that late], so 17 inmates cut themselves with razors in protest." After 50 episodes the show was cancelled.

Working on Zola was challenging, says Tsekhman, whose lines were almost always in Russian. He had to balance going to school at Columbia and filming in Moscow. "Filming depended on when I was there. During those times when I came, we had to maximize our time, because they understood I had to get back to New York."

Tsekhman's life didn't always involve awards shows and regular trips to Moscow. Until he turned 23, this Wharton School of Business graduate was set to go into finance. "I liked finance, I still like it," he says, "but as I was taking classes there I was turned off by the menacing desire to get investment banking jobs that require you to sell your soul. I have friends in New York who work 90 to 100 hours a week. It's not a lifestyle that I looked forward to. As I discovered theatre, it suddenly opened up this new world to me."

His first legitimate foray into acting was pretty atypical – he joined an Orthodox theatre group whose mission was to get Orthodox kids into acting. Tsekhman, who isn't Orthodox, decided to try out anyway and landed a main role by default. "It eventually came down to the fact that the lead actor in the show needed to kiss a girl, and none of the other actors could do it because they were all shomer negiah, so I said I'll do it. I'm not sure why they chose that play, but they did and they had to stay faithful."

Tsekhman quickly fell in love with acting and knew it was his calling. However, after he graduated from Wharton he landed a job with an investment bank in Los Angeles and was faced with a major decision.

"Friends of mine told me I should take the job," says Tsekhman. "I'll be in L.A., and that's where the film and TV industry is. Well, I turned down the job, came back to Toronto and tried to get into the industry. I did one theatre show in Toronto at this small community theatre in the Beaches, and then I realized that I needed to train. I wasn't aware of the classics, and really, nothing about theatre, so I wanted to learn."

That's how he ended up at Columbia. The adjustment from the business world to life as an acting student wasn't easy though. "I was sort of the outsider," he says. "Most people had done theatre in undergrad and had significant experience in New York. I was the guy who asked the dumb questions in class. It was hard for me initially because I really felt sort of lost, but it was important. I pushed myself not to be afraid to ask those questions and clarify things. The most difficult was the cultural differences between theatre and business school. Within a month at theatre school, you can really see other people's vulnerability."

Now, armed with degrees in business and acting and an award nomination under his belt, Tsekhman feels ready to tackle Los Angeles. He's not naive though – he knows it's going to be tough.

"Everybody in L.A. is an actor or a producer or a writer. Everyone's in the industry. It's totally daunting, but I try not to think about it, because if you think about it, it's too scary."

LIEL, 17-YEAR-OLD ISRAELI SINGING SENSATION, TO GIVE CONCERT HERE

Born on a kibbutz in the Galilee, the beautiful Israeli singer Liel made her show-business debut at the age of 11 and won a number of talent contests. At 14, she sang at the 80th birthday party of now-Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, and invited one notable attendee – former U.S. president Bill Clinton – to sing with her. Clinton obliged and the image of them singing together was carried via CNN around the world. She's also sung with Elton John, Richard Gere, Bono and German rockers Scorpions.

Now 17, Liel has a large following in Europe, where sales of her recently released CD Unison are especially strong. She sings in five languages, plays guitar and composes her own music. (Sample her music at the website www.Liel.net.)

Liel sang a few numbers at a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto function this summer and will return here soon to give a full concert in aid of the Israeli-based Save A Child's Heart Foundation.

Located in the Wolfson Medical Center in Holon, near Tel Aviv, Save A Child's Heart arranges about 200 corrective surgeries annually for children with congenital abnormalities of the heart. The Canadian branch of the foundation was established by Ephraim Diamond, formerly of the Cadillac-Fairview Corp.

Organizers hope Liel will help raise about $80,000 for the foundation. Her concert is Nov. 11 at the Toronto Center for the Performing Arts. Tickets are $100 (includes reception), $50, $40 and $25 (students with ID). Contact Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111, or www.ticketmaster.ca. Israeli Specialist in Canadian Lit: Israeli college instructor Danielle Schaub began a cross-Canada promotional tour last week for her new book, Reading Writers Reading, which features her photographs of more than 160 Canadian authors, accompanied by brief texts about reading from the authors themselves.

Margaret Atwood

Featured scribes include Margaret Atwood, Mavis Gallant, Nancy Huston, Alistair MacLeod, Yann Martel and Josef Skvorecky. Schaub has met many of them, even befriended some, through regular attendance at the annual Eden Mills Writing Festival and other Canadian literary events.

Schaub, who teaches Canadian literature at Oranim College near Haifa, was in town Sept. 12 for a book launch at David Mirvish Books. Many themes in Canadian literature touch her deeply, she told The CJN, because they focus on "issues dealing with identity and belonging, community, nation, multicultural and multilingual heritage – all of these are things that we wandering Jews have in common."

At her students' request, she began photographing Canadian writers five years ago. "[They] were frustrated with the tiny book-jacket photos of the authors they were reading, and they said, 'We want to know the writers we're studying,'" she said.

Her regular e-mail correspondence with Canadian writers "helped me keep reality at bay" during the recent war with Hezbollah, as deadly missiles dropped in and around Haifa. "Even when I was going in and out of the shelter, [the writers] were asking me how I was. They were very helpful and it was very therapeutic."

Born in the Sultanate of Brunei, Schaub has lived in Venezuela, Belgium, England and other countries. Her month-long tour of Canada also takes in Vancouver, Victoria, Montreal, Halifax, Sackville, N.B., Ottawa, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary.

Reading Writers Reading was published by the University of Alberta Press in collaboration with Hebrew University and Magnes Press. For a preview of Schaub's photographs, see her website, http://web.mac.com/danielleschaub/iWeb/Site/Welcome.html

Rhode Island boasts the oldest synagogue in continental USA

By WILF GEROFSKY
Special to The CJN

The Touro Synagogue in Rhode Island

NEWPORT, R.I. — George Washington hopefully never slept there. But he did visit the Touro Synagogue along with his secretary of state, Thomas Jefferson, on Aug. 15, 1790. While there, he received the congratulations of the congregation for his military success in the Revolutionary War and his subsequent election as the first president of the new republic.

In a handwritten letter to the congregation, he addressed "his fellow citizens of the stock of Abraham," saying his government would "give to bigotry no sanction, to persecution, no assistance." Many feel that this statement laid the groundwork for freedom of religion in the United States. Washington's letter is read aloud once each year to the congregation.

Newport, R.I., was a busy, prosperous port when Aaron Lopez settled there in 1752 at the age of 21. He emigrated from Lisbon and joined a growing community of Portuguese Jews who had come there as early as 1650, after seeking refuge in Recife, Brazil, and Curacao.

Lopez established the sperm-oil industry in the United States and built his own fleet of whaling ships and merchantmen, which sailed the Atlantic searching for whales. An early map of Newport shows Lopez's wharf in the middle of the harbour area.

In 1759, Lopez helped build the oldest existing synagogue in continental United States. It has been used as a place of Jewish worship since then. The building is a gem of colonial architecture, of Georgian design, and recent renovation has restored the interior Ionic and Corinthian columns, the five handsome brass chandeliers and the magnificent Ark to their original pristine elegance.

When we visited Newport recently, we took a tour of the building and were lucky to have the rabbi himself show a small group of us around and answer our questions about its history.

The building is set diagonally on its lot so that worshippers could face east while still facing the Ark. It continues to be used for services, and while it was originally Sephardi, the present congregation is mainly Orthodox Ashkenazi. Many bnei mitzvahs and weddings are held there. The beauty, history and tradition of this place add a very special beauty to these events.

We were shown the "seat of honour," where Washington and Jefferson sat during their visit. A Torah scroll dating back to 1495 rests in the Ark, and there is a hidden escape hatch leading to a tunnel out of the building. These early Jews still remembered the horrors of the inquisition and weren't taking any chances.

There are lots of other good reasons to visit Rhode Island. It's easily accessible via I-95, close to Cape Cod and Boston, and its capital city, Providence, is a treasure house of colonial architecture.

Newport was the summer playground of the fabulously wealthy robber barons of the late 19th century, the place where they established their great rambling stone "cottages." Many of these like The Breakers, the vacation home of the Vanderbilt family, are open to visitors, and the fact that the original furniture, draperies and kitchen utensils are still there makes a tour of at least one of these splendid mansions a must. And of course Newport is the home of a famous jazz festival and for years was the site of the America's Cup yacht race.

But even with all its other sterling attractions, its historic harbour and its fine restaurants with ocean views, the one that alone would make the trip to Newport, R.I., worthwhile is a visit to the lovely old Touro Synagogue.

Novel explores 'trans-generational trauma' in survivors

The House on Lippincott by Bonnie Burstow, Inanna Publications.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Bonnie Burstow had been thinking about writing a non-fiction book about "trans-generational trauma in Holocaust survivor families," but then decided to handle the subject as a novel instead.

"I wanted something that would appeal to a broader audience than Jews and psychologists," explains the 61-year-old psychotherapist and instructor at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE).

Bonnie Burstow

Burstow's first novel, The House on Lippincott, presents a family story that focuses on a Holocaust-survivor couple and their three daughters in postwar Toronto.

Most of the action is set in the house in Toronto's Annex neighbourhood that gives the story its title. "The house ends up being so significant to the novel that it's almost a character in itself," Burstow said.

However, as in most survivor families, enduring nightmares and flashbacks from the Holocaust dominate the Himmelfarbs' emotional lives.

The parents' formative memories of Auschwitz affect their daughters so strongly that Miriam, the middle daughter and narrator, has vicarious flashbacks of her parents' concentration-camp experiences as if they were her own. As a grown woman, she becomes a philosophy professor who develops a stay-at-home syndrome, unable through guilt to leave her parents' abode.

By contrast, Sondra, the eldest daughter, leaves home as a teenager. She prefers an unpalatable life on the streets as a "sex-trade worker" rather than endure a home life where her own emotional needs are forever trumped by her parents' recollected horrors.

"I'm a trauma specialist, and I can tell you this is a feature common to many families of Holocaust survivors," Burstow said. "The pain of the parents is so large that there is no room for the pain of the kids."

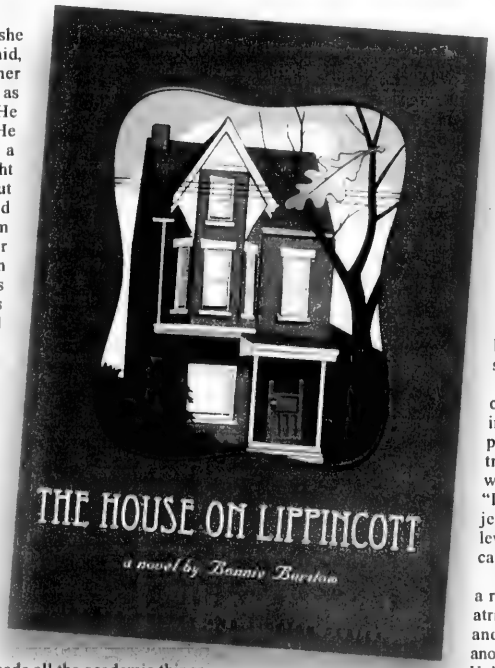
The House on Lippincott also deals with the theme of sexual abuse: it's a dark family secret that is never discussed. Burstow says she wasn't trying to equate the two evils, only to show that "the acknowledged trauma in the family has a space that the unacknowledged trauma does not have."

The two experiences "are in no way made to look the same or equal," she said. "But one of the daughters feels that she can't talk about her pain because the pain of her parents is so much greater. There's no space for it, and it's one of the reasons she leaves the family at age 15 and doesn't come back until she's in her early 50s."

A post-Holocaust novel that deals primarily with the after-effects on the next generation, The House on Lippincott readily presents its post-modern credentials. For one thing, the characters exist within a psychologically complex interior world that seems as private and restrictive as their family home. They are also racked with guilt and pain, and exist within a realm that seems highly cerebral and infused with a strong sense of dissonance.

Gender politics are also rife, as when the main female characters present feminist takes on biblical stories or opine that males take up too much space. "Men take up room, Miriam," mother tells daughter resignedly, as if articulating a historic injustice. "More than their share. It's always been. I'm hoping maybe your generation can do something about it. Meydeleh, you will push them away if they overstep, yes?"

Still, the mother "is the kind of mother that everyone dreams of having because she is so loving," Burstow said, adding that even the father becomes more sympathetic as the story progresses. "He really grows on you. He makes mistakes but he's a man who tries to do the right thing. He often doesn't, but he has ethical principles and he loves his family. I see him as a sympathetic character but one fraught with his own mistakes and haunted by his secrets and his past. He's certainly the most haunted figure in the novel."



A child of survivors who grew up in Winnipeg, Burstow is the author of Radical Feminist Therapy, a previous work of non-fiction. The House on Lippincott took her five years to write: she found the creative process "a lot of hard work" but exhilarating. "It was exciting to be able to breathe my knowledge as a psychologist into these characters. This [project] asked more of me than anything else I'd written, and made all the academic things I'd written look very easy to do."

She has already started a second novel, a multi-generational saga centred around a recipient of electro-shock treatment. "You see shades of the problems caused by psychiatry in The House on Lippincott, but in my new novel that's the central theme – the devastation of people's lives at the hands of the psychiatric system."

Does she like to write on subjects involving intense psychological pain? "I wouldn't be a trauma specialist otherwise," she commented. "I'm drawn to these subjects on a psychological level and also on a political level."

Burstow recently gave a reading during Psychiatric Survivor Pride Week and is scheduled to do another on Nov. 4 as part of Holocaust Education Week.

BMO head slams one-sided Israel critics

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Singling out Israel for blame in the Middle East conflict, even by those of good faith, is fanning anti-Semitism, Bank of Montreal president Tony Comper says.

It may not be the intent, but the effect of condemning Israel alone is providing justification for hatred of Jews in Canada and internationally, Comper warned more than 400 business executives at a Canadian Club luncheon last week in Montreal.

In underscoring the serious threat of anti-Semitism worldwide, Comper suggested that "a second Holocaust" is possible if Iran acquires nuclear arms and attacks Israel.

As examples of the kind of anti-Israel criticism he was talking about, Comper offered the call for a boycott of Israel by the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Toronto conference of the United Church of Canada earlier this year.

"I ascribe no motives to the people who made these decisions beyond the ones they ascribed to themselves – a legitimate disagreement with Israeli policy regarding Palestine.

"While I profoundly disagree with this one-sided take on who's to blame for what in the Middle East, and find its solutions untenable, I accept that these views can be honestly held, and can also be – let me stress this – utterly free of anti-Semitic intent.

"What I worry about though is not the intent but the effect of criticizing Israel so vehemently and disproportionately and, as tends to be the case, to the exclusion of all others. I worry that those with darker motives will treat these honestly held views as justification for hating Jews and wishing them scourged from the Earth."

The fine distinction between "Israeli policy" and "the Jews" may be understood by well-educated and well-intentioned critics, he said, but is lost on those looking for a pretext to vent their prejudices.

There are also "dishonest critics" of Israel, according to Comper, who "rewrap their hatred of Jews into a much more discreet package," such as comparing Israel to the Nazis.

Asked later by reporters about three Quebec politicians' participation in the Aug. 6 march in Montreal against Israel's military action in Lebanon, Comper said, "It disappointed me. There was no mention of Hezbollah's attacks on Israel. I wonder if it was a wise thing. I worry that the effect could be damaging."

Comper was in Montreal for the Quebec launch of Fighting Anti-Semitism Together (FAST), a coalition of non-Jewish business leaders and prominent citizens that he and his wife Elizabeth initiated last year in Toronto, where they live.

The project's centrepiece is an educational package, developed with Canadian Jewish Congress, for grades 6 to 9 designed to combat anti-Semitism within the context of bigotry and bullying. It's been distributed to more than 30 Ontario school boards reaching approximately 258,000 students.

A version adapted for Quebec, in both French and English, is being completed, and Comper hopes it will be in schools here by January. Talks are underway with the education ministry, and Comper believes "Choose Your Voice," as the package is called, fits with a new anti-racism policy the province is working on.

Beyond the educational component, FAST is intended to be a message to society from influential people that anti-Semitism "in all its forms" is unacceptable. FAST placed full-page ads in La Presse and the Gazette, coinciding with Comper's address, headlined "Why We Must Speak Out/Non-Jewish Canadian Leaders Stand Up Against Anti-Semitism in Canada."

Among the nearly 50 people endorsing FAST are Laurent Beaudoin, chair of Bombardier Inc.; André Desmarais, president of Power Corporation; Marc Tellier, president of the Yellow Pages Group; and National Bank president Réal Raymond.

Comper said he wants to recruit as many people in Quebec "with sufficient profile and clout" as he can. While financial support is expected, he said, the first requirement of FAST members is to publicly denounce anti-Semitism. He added that he doesn't think anti-Semitism is a greater problem in Quebec than the rest of Canada.

Comper said he's had no trouble getting people on board. "Two minutes into my pitch, they say sign me up. We fancy ourselves as a tolerant society. I'm not surprised by the response, but I am delighted."

He said he has received no hate mail, other than "one or two unsigned" letters, among correspondence that fills four or five volumes.

FAST was born out of his and his wife's dismay over a spate of anti-Semitic graffiti and cemetery desecrations in Toronto in 2004. They were especially concerned that Jewish children were fearful and felt that no one cared. As the ad stated, "We created FAST in honour of the right of Jewish children to live secure and unafraid, and with a solemn promise that Jews are no longer on their own in this great nation in this new century."

In his address, Comper said FAST hopes to create "a nation of non-bystanders, Canadians of all heritages who simply no longer permit the anti-Semites and their like-minded kin to spread their poison unscathed."

He said that non-Jews have a "duty" to repudiate anti-Semitic slurs whenever they encounter them, even in private conversations. "The time has passed for grimacing politely, letting the bigot 'have his opinion,' and easing away unobtrusively."

Comper deplored the widely circulated conspiracy theory that Jews were behind 9/11.

"Despite the patent falseness and naked absurdity of such a proposition, this big lie spread across the Internet like the Reichstag Fire… The bigger the lie, Hitler wrote in Mein Kampf, the greater the chance of it being believed. And, sadly, the lie that the Jews were behind Sept. 11 has not been an exception – almost assuredly, let us be honest, because when it comes to Jews and conspiracies, some people will truly believe just about anything. And, if history is any guide, a great many others won't really care or give it another moment's thought."

Will Shawn Green eclipse Hank Greenberg?

By MARTIN ABRAMOWITZ
JTA

BOSTON — If Jews had pantheons, Shawn Green, the premier Jewish baseball player of the last quarter-century, would be right up there in the baseball wing, a notch below Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax.

It would be hard to overstate the significance of Greenberg and Koufax in the history of American Jewish life.

That two of the best ballplayers of their generations could be Jewish – and that they could, 30 years apart, gently but proudly assert their Jewish identity by declining to play on Yom Kippur – was incredibly important for the self-confidence of American Jews of the 1930s and 1960s.

A few years ago, Green split the difference on Yom Kippur, skipping one game scheduled on the holiday, while playing in the other.

But if the question of Green's religious observance seems less fateful to this generation, the reason lies partly in the changes in American Jewry, and partly because Green, who recently was traded from the Arizona Diamondbacks to the New York Mets, is not Hank Greenberg.

At many levels, there simply is no comparison between the two players.

Greenberg was a consistently awesome slugger and a more successful overall batter than Green. His career slugging percentage of .605 is still among the top 10 in the history of the game, while Green went into the 2006 season at a respectable .505.

Green's career batting average of about .283 is solid, but pales next to Greenberg's .313 career average.

We also need to remember that Greenberg played for only 9½ seasons, missing virtually all of 1936 with an injury and virtually all of 1941, all of 1942-1944 and half of 1945 because of military service.

Green, on the other hand, is in his 12th full season, having gone into this year with almost 1,000 more career at-bats than Greenberg. So it's no wonder that Green's cumulative statistics, as distinct from his averages, are rivalling Hank's.

Still, the fact remains that Green's cumulative stats are impressive, and if he stays healthy, he is likely to become the all-time Jewish major-league leader in home runs and base hits. He also has an outside chance of overtaking Greenberg in runs batted in.

Consider the following data, as of Sept. 15:

• Green's 316 home runs leave him 15 shy of Greenberg's 331. At his current pace – he has 13 so far this season – Green would pass Greenberg during the first half of the 2008 season.

• Green's 1,861 career hits – Greenberg had 1,628 – leaves him within a three-year reach of Buddy Myer's total of 2,131. A second baseman for the Washington Senators, Myer, who also was Jewish, was a contemporary of Greenberg.

• Greenberg's total of 1,276 career RBIs would be more of a stretch for Green, who has 1,017.

Green's power numbers have been declining for the past few years, even as his batting average has remained relatively steady. Nonetheless, five more years at an average of 60 RBIs per year would take him past Greenberg at age 39.

However many productive seasons may lie ahead of Green, we can be sure of two things:

• He'll be remembered as the premier Jewish major leaguer of his time, but Green won't follow Greenberg, Koufax and Lou Boudreau to become the fourth Jewish major leaguer in the Hall of Fame.

• Perhaps as long as baseball records are kept, Green will be remembered as the player who had the most productive nine-inning-game performance in the history of baseball: On May 23, 2002, Green electrified the baseball world by slugging four homers, a double and a single in a game for the Los Angeles Dodgers against Milwaukee.

But will he or won't he overtake Greenberg and Myer to become the all-time Jewish career leader in homers, RBIs and hits? And will he or won't he achieve his final stats while wearing a Mets uniform?

And at this time in American Jewish life, aren't those questions at least as interesting as whether he plays on Yom Kippur?

Martin Abramowitz produces Jewish baseball cards and lectures on Jews in baseball as president of Jewish Major Leaguers Inc., on the Web at www.jewishmajorleaguers.org.

Family drama on the High Holy Days

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

"So, Edith, what are you doing for Rosh Hashanah?" I asked the 87-year-old patient, who was accompanied by her daughter Ruth.

It was the fourth time I had seen her over nine months and she seemed comfortable with me. She had been referred because of cognitive decline, as a result of a combination of Alzheimer's disease and mini-strokes. She was receiving one of the drugs used for people with Alzheimer's disease, as well as a blood pressure drug. Her daughter thought Edith was a bit more alert and engaged since the medications were started.

Edith lived in her own apartment in the same building as her daughter, whose family included her husband and her son who was doing graduate studies at a local university. Ruth's two daughters were married and lived in the city with their families. Edith had full-time live-in help.

Ruth's sister Fran lived about 30 minutes away. She was a widow whose two children and their families lived out of town. David, their younger brother, lived in the city, but in the downtown area. He was divorced after a short marriage but had recently re-married, to Susan, whom everyone liked very much and who was very eager to be accepted into the family.

"I think I'll stay home this year," Edith replied.

"Why?" I asked.

"It's just too much tummel, with all the kids and the travelling."

I turned to Ruth, who explained: "Last year, we went to Fran's, and by the time we got there, mom was already tired. Halfway through the meal, she said she wanted to go home. We told her to go rest, but she insisted. That was the end of the celebration.

"David wants us to go to his apartment this year. Susan wants to show everyone that she is really part of the family and wants to host us all. He thinks it's a great idea."

Ruth said her response to him was, "After last year, I'm not sure it is such a good idea. I think that we should have the dinner at our apartment, because if mom is tired, she can go upstairs with her caregivers and we can continue with the festivities."

David was not happy and interpreted this rebuff as directed to Susan who is a lot younger than he is and is struggling with her status in the family.

This scenario, with some variation in other families, is not unusual and could turn into a family crisis. What should be the focus of the religious holiday can be lost because of personal needs and a misdirected family dynamic.

What everyone seems to be forgetting, perhaps other than Ruth, is that in their current collective family life, the focus should be on Edith, for whom the future does not hold many more years of being able to participate meaningfully in family gatherings of any kind. The medications that she is taking for her dementia will not stop the disease. It will likely progress and she will become less able to engage in holidays, family simchahs and joyful events.

A family meeting is necessary to get everyone to focus on Edith's needs, not their own. Ruth's suggestion makes the most sense. Have the Rosh Hashanah dinner at her place, and as much as possible, get Edith involved, even if it is to help in the kitchen or in setting the table. Include her in the event as much as she can tolerate, but when she gets tired, help her upstairs and everyone else can continue to mark the special day. No one should take it as a slight but rather as a way of expressing family solidarity and their love for Edith.

In a recent article in the New York Times Magazine, I read much more about the microbial content of the human body than I probably needed to know. Some facts:

• There are at least 10 times as many cells in a single person as there are stars in the Milky Way.

• Only about one in 10 of those cells are human. The other 90 per cent are microbes.

• Most of these microscopic organisms reside in our gut – as many as 100 trillion.

• "They are with us throughout our lives, and at the moment of our death they consume us." And we can't live without them.

• In the womb, we're microbe-free, but from the moment we enter the birth canal, we take on guests.

• By the time we're two years old, most of our guest microbes have settled in.

What does all of this have to do with Jewish education? First and foremost, it serves as a powerful illustration of Psalm 104, verse 24, "How great are your works, O Lord! In wisdom have you made them all; the Earth is full of your creatures." The more we learn about the micro-universe of our own bodies, the more we can appreciate the wonder of God's creation.

This information about ourselves (new as it is for most of us) sheds new light on old but venerable Jewish values. Think of the mitzvah of taking in guests, hachnasat orchim, as taking on new meaning when we realize that our bodies take in many more guests than the original inhabitants. Or, what new slant can this information put on the verse in Leviticus, "You shall love your neighbour as yourself"?

Even our primal belief in one God is refined by this information, in that only God can speak as one, while we humans are too diverse biologically to think of ourselves as one organism with one voice.

All of this is to make the point that I have made in other ways at other times: Torah is everywhere if we can find the way to both read it into our lives and read our lives (in this case, our very bodies) into it.

Shanah Tovah.

On choosing a chair

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

There is a concept in Judaism called a makom ka'vuah, which translates into "an established place." This refers to an established seat one would use whether in shul, at home or other places.

When I was little, my father's makom ka'vuah was at the head of the table and my mother's at the other end. They were two seats that my sisters and I would never sit in. I would hazard to guess, however, that in 29 years (my age when my father passed away), I might have sat in my parents' chairs a handful of times.

In terms of my own place at the family table, I established early on that I would sit next to my father, on his left, and this was not to be messed with. Today, I have a place at my own table. I would offer it to a guest, but you know, would prefer not to.

Many of us have an established places to sit in the shul we attend. That place is sacrosanct and fierce arguments can erupt if, God forbid, someone is found sitting in it. There is a sense that our sacred place has been trespassed and we have been uprooted and are lost.

This tradition of "ensuring one's own place" is equally as strong with "three-day-a-year shul goers" who reserve the same seat every year – the eighth bench from the end, aisle seat, plus the three places next to it.

Having one's own place to sit, even if it is in a jail lunchroom, is a widespread ritual. We even hold to this custom when it comes to our place in the afterlife. Frequently, we pray for "our place" in heaven, imagining we will sit at God's feet in a lowly chair, yet one that is ours. I have never met a person who imagines he/she will stand in heaven, or spent all their time walking about.

So, why do we insist on having a makom ka'vuah? Why would many of us get riled at the person who has mistakenly seated himself or herself in our place?

In the case of not taking our parents' chairs, Judaism states that it is out of respect. We are intent upon adhering to the commandment of honouring one's father and mother, by recognizing that a spot on the earth is designated for them – not only as human beings but also because they are the two people who made us.

Overall, be it in shul on Shabbat or on the High Holy Days, or on the bus, the idea of having our reserved place might be predicated on our need to attach ourselves to the earth under us, or the heavens above.

Life can be shaky and uncertain. We know that, having just gone through the fifth anniversary of 9/11 and now standing before our Creator on the High Holy Days. Making sure that a tiny spot on this globe is ours, where we can take the load off, relax, contemplate or just eat, may be an expression that life is now a little bit more certain; a touch safer; a place where we feel as though the world will not move under us – even for a moment.

At this time of year, I therefore wish you and yours a happy and healthy new year and that you find your makon ka'vuah in our world.

May we all be inscribed in the book of life, and pray that those who have gone before us have found a good, comfy chair next to God, to finally kick back, relax and take in the holiness of the World to Come.

Shanah Tovah!

A momentous time, 40 years ago

Editorial

In the traditions, history and lore of Jewish life, the number 40 carries profound weight. Indeed, it is at this time of year, in the weekly Torah portions that are a prelude to the recommencement of the annual reading cycle, that the figure essentially leaps off the parchment of the holy scrolls each Shabbat.

For it is 40 years after the exodus from Egypt. The generation of Jews that experienced first hand the miracles wrought by "the strong hand and outstretched arm of God" has mostly perished in the mountainous, harsh wilderness of Sinai.

A new, more rugged generation has been born in the desert that knows of the great Exodus only as a festival story told by the elders once a year.

Moses, the wise, hoary, though somewhat distant teacher, is recounting the events of 40 years ago with exacting and occasionally frightening detail. He implores his people, younger than he by at least one full generation, to be faithful to God, to embrace the ways of their forebears, to know their past, to build a better world and to choose the values of life, virtue and goodness at all times and for all times.

In the wide sweep of human history, 40 years is mostly a minor interlude. But in the narrower span of individual lives, it is half a lifetime, and often too, a wedge of time disconnecting personal experience and collective memory.

And that is why the wise and hoary Moses recapitulated for the next generation what was experienced by the former generation.

It is in that spirit and for the same purpose that The CJN has chosen to dedicate this Rosh Hashanah supplement entirely to the events of The Six Day War.

With the arrival of the new year 5767, we step 40 years away from that momentous and monumental time in Jewish and world history.

And in those 40 years, an entire generation has been born that has no first-hand, direct knowledge of the events and and the feelings that kept us, the older generation, holding our breath, fearful that a new horrific, black night was descending upon Israel and Jews worldwide.

An entire generation of Jews has grown to adulthood with a sense of Israel and recent Jewish history, our history, distorted by the unceasing hostility of hate-obsessed enemies, and worse, by the unwitting participation of often well-meaning but ignorant confederates.

An entire generation of Jews has grown to adulthood with the predominant image of Israel as "colonial occupier," an image carefully crafted and exploited over the past four decades by the unremitting barrage on television and in newspapers of scenes of stone-throwing Palestinian children squaring off against well-armed, flak-jacketed Israeli soldiers or of wailing Palestinian women confronting IDF tanks and heavy equipment.

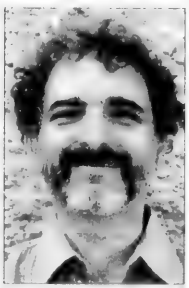
Suddenly Israel felt precarious

What It Was Like



By Larry Barzelai

There was no need to question the existence and health of the State of Israel. I was born in 1950, two years after the establishment of the state. Without any direct knowledge of the events of the 1948 War of Independence, Israel seemed as if it had always been there. The population was increasing; the economy was proliferating; tourism was thriving. The best oranges were Jaffa oranges; Israeli irrigation projects were proliferating around the world; the Israeli fashion industry was in full bloom. (My father, alav hashalom, imported 10,000 pair of El Al pantihose to sell in his clothing store in Peterborough.)

Then, Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser asked the UN to remove its troops from its observation posts in Sinai. Egyptian and Syrian troops were seen to be massing at the border. Hordes of screaming Egyptian citizens were calling for Israel to be wiped off the map.

Suddenly Israel felt precarious. As Jews we suddenly did not feel so secure any more. We learned to appreciate Israel much more because we felt that its existence and well-being had been threatened.

Then in a flash, Israel attacked and pre-emptively destroyed the Egyptian and Syrian air force. Quickly, the Sinai and Golan were in Israeli (our) hands. How we beamed with pride when the IDF captured Hevron, Jericho and especially the old city of Jerusalem. Who can forget the one-eyed general Moshe Dayan leading his troops into battle and Rabbi Shlomo Goren blowing the shofar at the Kotel.

How we held our heads high when our non-Jewish neighbours congratulated us on Israel's great victory. Who can forget the jokes galore that proliferated after the war. "What is the definition of an Arab tank? – a vehicle with one gear forward and four in reverse" and "Why is Nasser bowing down in prayer? – He's not praying; he's listening for Israeli tanks."

Israel was almost too good to be true. It had vanquished its enemies; it had gathered in the Jewish Diaspora from all parts of the world; it was making scientific advances galore. What an astounding place with a fantastic future!

Riding on the coattails of Israel's victory, I attended the Hebrew University of Jerusalem during the academic year 1969-1970. Jewish students from all parts of the globe came to study in Israel and to share in the 'Israeli experience.' We learned Israeli songs, made Israeli friends and studied Talmud and Jewish history.

What a great time we had in the late 60s. In America, we had "sex, drugs and rock and roll." We listened to Simon and Garfunkle, Bob Dylan, the Beatles. In Israel, we listened to the songs of Naomi Shemer, revelled in the annual Israel Song Festival, and even watched the rock musical, Hair being performed in Hebrew. We swam in the clear waters of the Red Sea off the coast of Sharm al Sheikh, hiked up Santa Catarina in the Sinai and wandered carelessly through the alleyways of the Old City of Jerusalem.

How we held our heads high when our non-Jewish neighbours congratulated us on Israel's great victory

Amidst this general euphoria, there were some uncertainties, but we kept them at the back of our minds. Two conversations I had in Jerusalem that year stood out. The first was with an Israeli-Arab colleague at the university. He said, "You know, the Middle East is like a house with many rooms. All the rooms are occupied by Arabs who speak the same language and share the same culture. However, one of the rooms is occupied by a different people, who don't quite fit in. They are not a part of this house." I thought to myself, "He'll just have to get over his hangup."

The other conversation I had with others was concerning the future disposition of the territories. I opined "Israel can't hold on to these territories forever. It will become an occupying power and this can't bode well for the future." The general response I received was something like "Don't rain on the parade" or "This will sort itself out with time."

Was there something prescient about these conversations or were they just intellectual musings? – Who could tell at that time?

Our children must know what has been our past

The nearly ubiquitous heart-rending visual scenes have been reinforced with the imprimatur of the mountain-high record of debates, minutes and resolutions from the United Nations, thus driving home the "truth" of the images in the hearts and minds of an unknowing generation. There is no Israel other than this Israel for so many of our unknowing youth.

We have seen much of the result of this vast distortion, alas, on campuses throughout the western world, where Israel has been vilified, demonized and delegitimized. And many if not most of our Jewish youth have been unable to answer the horrible lies. Worse. Increasing numbers of our Jewish youth actually join in the calumny.

If our children are to be able to resist the effect of the lies and the distortions, we must help them. We must provide the wherewithal, the weaponry as it were, to enable them to stand up confidently and assuredly for themselves and for Israel.

Truth must be their sword and knowledge their shield.

To help forge these weapons, The CJN offers this supplement about the Six Day War, a watershed moment – among so many in the young life of the tiny country – merely 19 years after it was created.

The supplement consists of five categories of information. Nine individuals from across the country write about what those fateful few days in May and June 1967 were like for them.

Four widely acclaimed and recognized thinkers, scholars, writers reflect on some of the wider aspects and implications of the Six Day War.

We have also recorded the personal testimonies of a soldier and two volunteers and assembled original reference material of speeches and other significant documents of the times that establish a record mostly ignored or wilfully maligned today.

And, of course, we publish a number of archival photos of that time, which we hope help emphasize the unique peril and relief of those days.

Like all generations, it is vital that the next generation knows its past, our past. And though 40 years are essentially still an immediate past, for some it might as well be ancient history. They know so little about the tumultuous events of the Six Day War that unfolded before they were born.

In our High Holy Day prayers, we beseech God that we not be cast aside in our old age. In the same spirit, let us this year also beseech our own consciences and implore of ourselves, our friends and our peers to actively embrace the younger generation with the special love that confers information, knowledge and belonging.

We must try to ensure that our children know who they are, what has been our past, and the nature of our hopes for the future we will leave to them to continue building. Recalling and teaching the events of The Six Day War is a good way in the year 5767 to extend that embrace.

Something akin to panic gripped the Jewish community

By Don Carr

What It Was Like

Ominous news from the Middle East flooded the papers, radio and television for weeks. Egypt's Nasser closed the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping. He then demanded that the United Nations Emergency Force leave Sinai, where it had patrolled the Israel-Egypt border since the Suez debacle in 1956, when Britain and France were "allied" with Israel to prevent the closing of the Canal.

The UN obliged too quickly. The threat to Israel was imminent. It was the topic around dinner tables, community meetings, workplaces and social gatherings. Israel was surrounded by unified Arab countries, fielding 250,000 troops, over 2,000 tanks and 700 fighter planes, poised to attack.

Underlying the fear for Israel, was the unspoken, but deeply felt fear for all Jewry, in a world that might, once again, have no haven.

From Toronto, war seemed to start in a flash. Before we knew it, the pre-emptive strike to wipe out the Egyptian air force on the ground, brought reports of massive retaliation. The onslaught was not merely from the Sinai into the Negev, but from the Golan Heights, where massed Syrian armour descended on the kibbutzim, moshavim and villages around lake Kinneret.

Something akin to panic gripped the Toronto and Canadian Jewish community.

Without today's "embedded" TV cameras, reports from Arab sources trumpeted victories over Israeli forces. They drew vivid pictures of the Jewish state being overrun from the north, the south and, suddenly, from the east. Jordan joined the fray, shelling and striking towards West Jerusalem.

A well organized Jewish community reacted.

An emergency meeting of major fundraisers was called in Montreal by Sam Bronfman, the president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). Spurred by resounding speeches and voiced concerns of pending disaster, representatives from across the country returned to their communities, eager to do whatever was possible.

In Toronto, it wasn't just raising money for myriad urgent needs in Israel. Jewish doctors flocked to the offices of the Federation of Zionist Organizations of Canada (FZOC) on Marlee Avenue, volunteering to help in Israeli hospitals or at the front. It looked like Mt. Sinai Hospital would be without medical practitioners. Other volunteers from every sector came forward to replace Israeli reservists who had left behind every kind of civilian workplace. A population of the very young and the old was seen to be bereft of the infrastructure to provide essential services.

With co-operation from every corner of the Jewish community, a Toronto coordinating committee was established under the recognized natural leadership of Ray D. Wolfe, chairman and CEO of The Oshawa Group Limited.

Fundraising, media relations, representation to government, blood banks, community relations, the gathering of medical supplies, blankets and clothing and a speakers' bureau fell into place under the guidance of the co-ordinating committee.

Its members read like a who's who of Toronto Jewry. As I review the names of some of its members, I sadly see a list of leaders, most of whom are no longer with us. They included Kalmen Berger, Stephen Berger, Fred Catzman, "Buckie" and Madeleine Epstein, Phil Givens, Max Goody, Syd Harris, Julius Hayman, Morris Kaufman, Ben Kayfetz, Morrie Latchman, George Liban, Lou Lockshin, Syd Midanik, Morley Pape, Rabbi Gunther Plaut, Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, Sam Sable, Ben Schneider, Myer Sharzer, Nathan Silver, Naftali Sokol, Harry Steiner, Wayne Tanenbaum, Harry Wolfson and me. I had then been the treasurer of the UJWF (later the federation), for three years. Wayne and I were probably the "babies" of the group.

Businesses and professions were left behind, as the urgency overshadowed all else. Toronto UJA called an emergency campaign and urgent meetings of its divisions were called.

The lawyers' division met at the home of Sydney Robins. Some 200 gathered in the open design living/dining room. I stood on the upstairs balcony overlooking them all. I read excerpts from a letter from Berko Devor, formerly house counsel to Revenue Properties, but by then a resident of Haifa. With unsteady hands and a breaking voice I recounted his description of the life and fears of Israelis as war drew close.

Trepidations gave way to exhilaration and thankfulness

Rabbi Gunther Plaut, of Holy Blossom Temple, who had assumed the leadership of the emergency campaign, joined me on the balcony, having rushed from another similar meeting (of accountants or developers, I believe.) He added his articulate and stirring words to my appeal for immediate and public financial commitments. That night we raised more than ever before and, in company with other UJA divisions, not only set a new record, but established a new "base" for future campaigns.

The co-ordinating committee or its sub-committees met almost daily and in the evenings from June 6 until mid-July. Each member with a "portfolio" reported. Suggestions were made and the participants returned to their groups to implement quickly devised plans. Daily bulletins were distributed across the community.

Ben Schneider, executive director of UJWF, Myer Sharzer, executive-director of the Ontario region of CJC and George Liban, executive director of FZOC, led a cadre of co-operative professionals from a multitude of organizations to give support and encouragement to lay members of the community. State of Israel Bonds suspended its campaign and its workers joined the rest of the community.

There was concurrently a sense of foreboding, as well as a resolve to do everything that one could do to sustain those whom we believed were fighting, not only for their own survival, but for Jews everywhere.

As quickly as the war started, within days the trepidations gave way to a huge sense of relief, even exhilaration and thankfulness. The true nature of events became known. Still mindful of the sacrifices which had been made – and were still being made – the stunning victories of the Israel Defence Forces, the routing of the Arab armies, the capture of the whole of Jerusalem, the Golan Heights, Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip appeared miraculous. One was reminded of Ben Gurion's statement that only those who believed in miracles were realists!

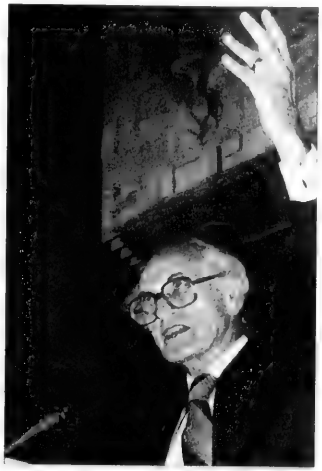
The life of the co-ordinating committee was a mere few weeks. The volunteer doctors were not needed, but some 55 to 60 other volunteers had gone on a 90 day program in Israel. Some $11 million, out of a total in excess of $23 million from Canada, had been collected and sent to Israel, with medical supplies and clothing. A community had united. The hope was expressed that the newly re-formed Joint Community Relations Committee of the FZOC, CJC and B'nai Brith would move forward cooperatively. (Unfortunately, the "partnership" later collapsed under the weight of inter-organizational politics, and continued solely in the hands of CJC).

In thanking the members of the committee, Ray Wolfe said, ... "we learned something of the mighty potential of unity, both with our people in Israel and, even more important, amongst ourselves. What was accomplished through combined effort in Israel's hour of peril set a standard which, for years to come, will inspire communities throughout the continent."

How relevant are those words to the existing crisis, almost four decades later!

Notwithstanding that the promise and euphoria of the results of the Six Day War were thwarted over the ensuing years, once again the community has received a call to be united to overcome what, this time, is now realized to be something more than an Israel/Palestinian Arab conflict. Rather, it is an advance guard on behalf of an international battle to prevent radical Islamists from overrunning the free world.

Don Carr is the president of The Canadian Jewish News.



The late Ray Wolfe, left, the founding president (1971-1990) of The CJN, and Rabbi Gunther Plaut were among the community leaders who lobbied on behalf of Israel.

Not since biblical times had Jews stood so proud

I was in Israel a few days after the Six Day War. Burnt-out Jordanian tanks still smouldered, littering the highway between Jerusalem and the Allenby Bridge. Perhaps the best way to describe the atmosphere before and after the Six Day War is to relate the experience of going to a Tel Aviv movie theatre to see the documentary/news film of the war.

It is important to remember that the Six Day War occurred less than 20 years after the establishment of Israel, and just a short a time after the liberation of Europe and the discovery of the horrifying concentration camps. Until the establishment of a Jewish state, all Jews in some way felt the vulnerability of dependence. And in that audience of the screening I attended were Holocaust survivors.

By A. J. Diamond

What It Was Like

The film began by showing the craven retreat of the United Nations forces in the Sinai at the behest of the ranting Egyptian president Col. Gamal Nasser. The troops were meant to be a buffer to the two states to prevent war. At the first sign of belligerence, UN Secretary General U Thant promptly withdrew the UN forces. Next the film moved to the debate in the United Nations, where, in effect, no action to restrain the Egyptians was taken. Subsequently, it was revealed that all adjoining states – Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and even Jordan were persuaded to join the conspiracy to attack Israel.

Doom seemed to be closing in on the Jewish state. Israel seemed alone, with no one but itself to counter this mortal threat to its existence. Most of the film up to this point, presumably shot with hand-held cameras in the field, was appropriately grainy and dark. The film showed the Egyptian army moving into Sinai and occupying strategic Sharm el Sheikh. One could feel the audience hunkering down, silent, fearful, perhaps recalling the times when there was no one to turn to for protection.

At this point the film, with dramatic contrast, showed the Israeli Air Force taking off in formations of the Star of David. The movie theatre erupted with cheers and applause. I felt goose bumps and hot behind the eyes.

The film then proceeded to show clips shot from the camera ports of the fighter jets of the Israelis destroying, with pinpoint accuracy, the entire Egyptian Air Force caught napping on the ground, then the destruction of Egyptian tank columns in the Sinai and finally the breakneck speed with which the Israel Defence Forces swept through and occupied the whole of Sinai, the Golan Heights and the West Bank. To see Israeli soldiers, led by Gen. Moshe Dayan, making a pilgrimage to the Western Wall of the Temple Mount, inaccessible since 1948, was to bring tears to everyone's eyes.

No cavalry sent to the rescue, no superman saving the innocent from the jaws of evil, can convey the sense of euphoria, pride and gratification of that period. Perhaps not since biblical times had Jews stood so proud, vanquishing their enemies with a heroism that changed the ethos and self-esteem of Jews everywhere. Nothing can illustrate better the importance for Jews everywhere of the continuance of the existence of the State of Israel.

Israel was on her own, except for world Jewry

Har Ha-bayit beyadenu! The Temple Mount is in our control! With these electrifying words, thousands of years of Jewish history flashed before our eyes. The momentous victory of Israel in June 1967, following six days of intense fighting against Egypt, Syria, Jordan and the rest of the Arab world, was achieved.

By Libby Garshowitz

We can never forget the sight of victorious soldiers crying at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, as they held up the blue and white flag of Israel. Who can forget the sight of Rabbi Shlomo Goren blowing the shofar, the symbol of victory and thanksgiving. Our hearts were filled with gratitude that brave Israeli soldiers had been victorious, despite tragic losses and months of suffering. As world Jewry celebrated Israel's dramatic victory over her enemies, we in Toronto continued our community's efforts to help alleviate as much as possible some of the difficulties that remained.

But let us turn to the events that preceded this war. Israel, under its first prime minister, David ben Gurion, had always wanted to make peace with her Arab neighbours, as he had stated in his speech upon the creation of the State of Israel, when he stretched forth the hand of friendship. Golda Meir, Israel's foreign minister in 1960, reiterated that wish.

But the Arabs never accepted the proffered hand of peace, stating that they would never make peace with Israel. A bellicose, belligerent Gamal Abdel Nasser, the Egyptian president, stated: "The danger of the State of Israel lies in the very existence of Israel as it is in the present and in what she represents."

Indeed, the charter of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, with Yasser Arafat at its head, called for the destruction of the State. Annihilation of the State of Israel has always been the goal of the Arab world. And they tried incessantly to achieve it. To this end, fedayeen undertook cross-border attacks against Israeli farmers and villages, infiltrating from Jordan, the Gaza Strip and Lebanon.

Syria was shelling northern villages from the Golan Heights. Rarely was there heard a word of condemnation from the outside world, especially the United Nations. Israel-bashing, wars and battles of attrition were de rigeur from the moment of her inception. But several years later, when a non-Jewish group from Toronto was visiting the Golan Heights, one of its members stood on its hills, looked down upon the peaceful Israeli villages and said, "We can never give this back."

What It Was Like

Mere hateful words did not suffice for the arrogant, boastful Nasser. We watched, in fear and apprehension, as he threw out ineffectual UN troops from Sinai in order to move in Egyptian ones. Simultaneously, Syrian troops were lining up on the Golan Heights. Then Nasser closed the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping, effectively blocking the port of Eilat, Israel's lifeline, a true casus belli.

We Torontonians were following every move and development during that tense month of May as Nasser and Syrian President Hafez Assad were openly and boastfully plotting Israel's destruction, with the encouragement of Iraq, which threatened to wipe Israel off the map. Very little outside help was offered to a besieged Israel. Finally, Prime Minister Levi Eshkol gave the order to pre-empt and Toronto awoke on June 5, 1967, to CBC-Radio's announcement: Israel is at war! Chilling and gripping words.

Countries such as France, which had helped Israel in the past, now refused to do so. My parents, who were in Paris at the time, on their way back from Israel, were amazed by the massive outpouring of French citizens on the streets, who were totally committed to support and victory for the people of Israel. Not the French government, however. June 1967 marked the end of cordial relations between Israel and France.

While the Soviet Union and all the Arab countries were supplying troops and arms to the belligerents, no one was helping Israel. Israel was on her own, except for world Jewry. We remember how bitter we were. Israel was fighting a war on two fronts: Egypt and Syria.

Israel destroyed most of Egypt and Syria's air power on the opening day of the war, June 5. Jordan's King Hussein was warned not to enter the war but did not heed the warning and attacked. Israel was now fighting a war on three fronts: Syria, Egypt and Jordan. The crack Jordan Legion, which had been trained by the British Gen. John Bagot Glubb Pasha, became a new source of spine-chilling fear. Jordan, too, went down to ignominious defeat.

But more than that – Israel was now, at long last, in possession of her biblical heartland, Judea and Samaria, and its capital! And on June 7, Jerusalem was united. The Mandelbaum Gate, which had marked the division of Jerusalem into east and west, was torn down. A colleague had told me that prior to 1967, the occasional daring American student studying at Hebrew University had tried to break through the gate. They were unceremoniously sent back home. That was no more. I remember shortly after how exhilarating it was to drive with a former Torontonian on the way to his lecture at Haifa University through King Hussein's former racing grounds.

In the meantime, Toronto's Jewish community did not remain crippled by fear but instantly galvanized and mobilized. Various groups formed to gather medical and drug supplies and whatever else was necessary. Medical specialists in trauma, surgery, orthopedics and other fields flew to

Arabs' claims of honouring holy places were lies

Israel to help. Many Toronto Israelis returned to join their units at war. Scheduled gala events in the Jewish community were not cancelled but were turned into fundraisers. Everyone helped. Young families who were carefully budgeting for tuition money to send their children to Jewish day schools, or saving for vacations or camp or even new furniture, turned that money over to the rescue funds for Israel.

At the University of Toronto, Emil Fackenheim, a native of Germany and a well-known rabbi and philosopher, taught that Judaism and Jewish life must flourish after the slaughter of six million Jews during the Shoah. He believed that the existence of Israel mattered not only to Jews but to all humankind. I remember standing in the quadrangle of University College during the Six Day War, listening, with many others, to his impassioned speech about the Jewish state's existence and survival. I believe that the Six Day War became the turning point for Fackenheim's total involvement in the State of Israel's welfare and his eventual aliyah to Israel with his family.

On a more personal note, I had completed my MA and was a pre-doctoral student at the U of T. Some faculty members in our department were hesitant to open up the subject of war during those days, but the quizzical, and sometimes inimical, looks on their faces said it all. (That was not the case in 1973 when I was completing my doctorate. A state of virtual hostility then existed). In 1967, a fellow MA student, and a prominent clergyman in the Christian community, called me to wish Israel good luck and good fortune. "Beat them," he said. He did not call in 1973. We still remain good friends.

On June 11, 1967, a ceasefire was signed

Other memories surface. Ubiquitous bumper stickers appeared and helped put matters into perspective and relieve some of the tension. Most young children remember the "Israel is real" bumper sticker, wondering if Israel was spelled two ways. A profusion of political cartoons dominated the editorial pages. I remember one particularly well: an Arab seated backward on a camel, upraised sword, or gun, in his arm, shouting "charge."

As the war drew speedily and successfully to its end, exhilarated Israelis regained their sense of humour. The Soviet Union had been the Arab world's main supplier of armaments, advanced missile technology and personnel, advising the Egyptians during the June 1967 war. That increased our apprehension. But fear turned to jeers when Israelis began mocking the Soviet Union as they collected Soviet missiles and technology from the hapless Arabs: "Cut out the middlemen! Ship direct!" Black humour relieved a tense time.

As the week progressed and Israel was no longer in danger of being annihilated, Israel's, the world's and Toronto Jewry's anxiety turned to exhilaration. Today's baby boomers, many of whom were but young children at the time, vaguely recall the events as they unfolded, but they remember clearly the excitement of Israel's stunning victory, the euphoria, the bumper stickers, the gala victory rallies and the unification of Jerusalem. On June 11, 1967, a ceasefire was signed. The Israelization of North American Jewry had begun: Jews identified with the newly enlarged State of Israel, its inhabitants and its "old-new" history.

After Israel beat off the Arab armies of Egypt, Syria, Jordan and Iraq, Jerusalem, the ancient capital of the land of Israel, was unified: east Jerusalem, which had been in Jordanian hands for 19 long years, joined the western section of the city; the Kotel Maaravi, the Western Wall, once again became a site of pilgrimage; the Hebrew University campus at Har ha-Tzofim (the Mount of Olives), once again became the domain of students and faculty; the small group of university professors who had refused to leave there after 1948 could once again come and go openly, without subterfuge.

Jews learned that the Arabs' pretentious claims of honouring holy places were lies. They had destroyed Jewish tombstones on the Mount of Olives and had used them as paving stones, much as had been done in Spain hundreds of years before. Destruction of Jewish holy places was rampant.

On June 12, 1967, Israelis and world Jewry woke to a new reality but so did the Arab world. Israel was not annihilated, Israel was not pushed into the sea, and Israel and Israelis lived to see another day. The boastful Arab world had been humiliated and Israel had been victorious. The history of the ensuing years is part of that legacy.

I felt a chilling sense of foreboding

As the daughter of Yaacov Herzog, a senior Israeli diplomat and political adviser, so much of my childhood reflected personal and public experiences that were inextricably intertwined. The Six Day War was no exception.

Thus, on the one hand, as a nervous 14-year-old, I spent the three long "weeks of waiting [hamtana]," helping my mother stock up on supplies of non-perishables and block windows with sandbags and blackout tape. Like everyone else, I felt a chilling sense of foreboding and the unknown.

On the other hand, I regularly heard my father in phone conversations with Prime Minister Levi Eshkol and other government officials, in consultations that shaped seminal developments such as the formation of a national unity government with Herut leader Menachem Begin, the appointment of Moshe Dayan as defence minister and Chief of Staff Yitzhak Rabin's purported moments of weakness and doubt as final operational plans were debated.

By Shira Herzog

What It Was Like

I didn't know at the time that my father was also in constant communication with Jordan's King Hussein. As the secret emissary for the Israeli government, he urged the neighbouring monarch not to join the war by opening a third front. Israel had no issue with the Hashemite Kingdom, but King Hussein's subsequent, fateful decision to join the war on its third day led to his loss – and Israel's gain – of Jerusalem's holy sites and the West Bank, and to a transformed Middle East.

At the time, I saw and heard this all with a curious mixture of fascination and indifference. I was simultaneously gripped by the political drama, afraid of the war that was coming, and irritated at the inconvenience it caused. All in all, typical reactions of an adolescent. It took me years to unravel the meaning and import of events and discussions that I had witnessed up close.

On June 5, my father joined Prime Minister Eshkol at the War Room in Tel Aviv's Israel Defence Forces headquarters. Back in Jerusalem, I moved with my mother and siblings from our apartment to the safer ground floor of my home to the house belonging to my grandmother, Rabbanit Herzog. I sensed that war was imminent, but was sworn to secrecy.

My most vivid memory is the phone call we received on June 6 at 8:15 a.m. My father called from Tel Aviv and said tersely but with barely concealed exhilaration, "We've won the war!" Before the news had broken, just minutes after the fact, he already knew of the successful, lightning air strikes against the Egyptian and Syrian airfields. With their air power eliminated, it was clear that Israel's superiority would be uncontested in the fighting to follow, in spite of the inevitable casualty toll.

Six short days later, we returned home, only to find a piece of Jordanian shrapnel on the balcony. Jerusalem was no longer divided. The wall I had grown up with was gone. At the Western Wall on Shavuot (the first holiday after the war), I viscerally felt part of the continuum of Jewish history. Like most Israelis, I was swept up in an unprecedented wave of pride and patriotism.

In 1967, the challenges of the new reality, especially the burden of responsibility for the then two-million West Bank and Gaza Palestinians, were bubbling just below the surface. Six years later, the Yom Kippur War jolted Israel and reshaped its relations with Egypt and Syria. The decades-long debate over the future relationship with the Palestinians continues.

There was now hope for the Jewish future

It is certainly challenging to look back at the Six Day War of 1967 after Israel's recent war with Hezbollah. For it was in 1967 that we realized the full potential of Israeli military capability in the face of the existential threat that we felt during the weeks prior to June 5, 1967.

Yes, the ante-bellum feeling was that Israel – and the Jewish nation – was facing the real danger of a second Holocaust. Arab leaders of the countries surrounding Israel boasted that all Jews would be pushed into the sea as they massed armies, tanks and planes on Israel's borders. There was a dreadful foreboding in those days.

By Rabbi Howard Joseph

What It Was Like

On the first day, it was clear that Israel was heading for a dominant victory over its enemies. The news inspired Jews around the world who had been gathering to pray, discuss and raise funds during the preceding weeks. Their hopes and prayers had been rewarded; their fears denied.

My wife and I headed to Israel soon after the war. We connected with friends and family and shared their experiences. We toured all the new areas under Israeli control and walked around the walls of the Old City of Jerusalem.

For the capture of Jerusalem was indeed the most inspiring event of the time. Our holiest site was again in our hands after Jews had been denied access for 19 years. The Western Wall was visited by thousands of people each day. The gathering on Tisha b'Av, the traditional day of mourning for the Jerusalem Temples, felt more like a party than a day of sadness. Something extraordinary was happening. The question was – and maybe still is – what was the meaning of all of this for Jews, Judaism, Jewish history and spiritual life.

There certainly was a sense of inspiration among Jews. Many Jews who had no interest in Israel were now concerned and identified with Israel. Jewish identity was strengthened. After the demoralization of the Holocaust, there was now hope for the Jewish future. Israel appeared to be an important factor in that future as it made its commitment to protect Jewish life from those who would destroy Jews.

Jewish students began to flock to Israel for shorter or longer periods. Levels of voluntary aliyah rose in North America. A sense of confidence had entered Jews and Jewish life.

Then there was what we can call the "messianic temptation." Was this the beginning of the long-awaited messianic age? Were the creation of the State of Israel and the return of Jerusalem to Jewish sovereignty heavenly signs and events or just to be located in human terms?

Religious Jews had been debating this question even before the state existed. Traditionally, the notion of Jewish sovereignty over Israel was purely a messianic concept. But with the advent of Zionism, religious Jews split on the question of whether or not we could have a non-messianic return to the land and a state of our own.

From the very beginning some rabbis demonized Zionism as a rebellion against God and all that is holy. Zionists were usurping God's power, pushing the "end," and leading us to disaster.

Other rabbis saw the Zionist enterprise as a profound religious awakening, of preparing the nation for the future messianic redemption. Every tree and every inch of ground cultivated would bring us closer to that dream.

Finally, a third group of rabbis supported Theodor Herzl's political vision of Zionism: the purpose of Zionism is to lift the Jews from their dire straits and give them economic and political security. Secular political Zionists did not believe in the traditional messiah. Religious Zionists shared their political and social goals of improving the lot of our people, protecting us from the virulent anti-Semitism that was growing and doing all of this in our ancient homeland.

However, this latter group has always been beset by temptation. Living in the land and watching it flourish, witnessing the return of almost six million Jews to live there – aren't these signs of redemption? Just read the prophets and you will see.

This temptation grew with the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, and especially after the miraculous victory of 1967 when we all expected a terrible disaster.

After 1967, a split arose even within the religious Zionist movement. An intense and highly vocal group moved toward the messianic temptation and somewhat silenced the others who were more cautious on this issue.

The first group was in the forefront of the religious settler movements that spread throughout the newly acquired territories. They also led the battle against disengagement from Gaza in 2005. They will probably fiercely resist any future attempts to remove Jews from ancient biblical lands.

As I look back on the Six Day War, I see it as a turning point for many different Jews in many different ways. The sense of strength, confidence and security that it gave Jews has been sometimes challenged by subsequent events, but I believe it gave my generation at least a very strong attachment and involvement with one of the great events of Jewish history: the creation of the modern State of Israel. As future generations focus on its importance, it may do the same for them.

Our most exemplary demonstration of oneness

In early July, when I was asked to reflect on what I remember about the Six Day War and what it was like for me at the time, I could not have imagined that a few days later our beloved Jewish State of Israel would find itself once again in a perilous state, much like it did in 1967.

The same thoughts and fears that ran through my mind almost 40 years ago surfaced anew. I was 23 years old when the Six Day War broke out. I was a young stay-at-home mom with two infants.

By Julia Koschitzky

What It Was Like

I had not yet experienced what Jewish communal involvement was all about, but I recall vividly how I was riveted to the television when news of the war broke out.

I also remember the third day of the war, when Jerusalem was liberated. It was not just the day that Jerusalem became one, and not just the day when Jews were able to fulfil their longing to pray once again at the Kotel, but it was also a day when Jews worldwide experienced a phenomenal upsurge of Jewish identification. If ever Jews felt truly as one nation, it was then.

It was our most exemplary demonstration of oneness. It was the kind of feeling that we experienced at the Israel solidarity rally this past July 26 when we gathered at Mel Lastman Square.

The outpouring of love, commitment and concern was palpable, and people were consumed by a deep yearning to assemble together in the spirit of "oneness" and to stand shoulder to shoulder with their brothers and sisters in Israel to tell them that they were not alone.

Elie Wiesel described it so vividly in 1967 when he noted that:

- University students flooded embassies to enlist for the fight.
- The Chassidim of Williamsburg declared days of fast and prayer.
- Youngsters from assimilated homes organized fundraising drives.
- Millionaires cast aside their business and took off for Israel.
- Community leaders went sleepless night after night because of their great efforts and profound anxiety.

Jews throughout the world felt as if their own fate was bound up with that of Israel, and they responded accordingly, Wiesel said.

It was a defining moment in our lives. It brought back memories of the darkest hours of our history, as well as its greatest triumphs.

The Six Day War that liberated Jerusalem was a catalytic event that had a powerful impact on Jewish consciousness. Jews were emotionally involved in a way they would not have thought possible a few months earlier.

I will never forget a comment made by a close friend of mine at the time who said she was not in any position to contribute money, but she would willingly donate her blood for her Israeli brethren.

In Charles Silverman's book A Certain People, we are reminded that large numbers of people brought their contributions to the campaign offices in person, as if mailing a cheque was too easy. By coming themselves, they seemed to feel that they were participating in a physical way.

In those days, giving money was not simply an act of charity, it was a way of enlisting in Israel's struggle for survival, of becoming a participant rather that a passive spectator.

Our own Rabbi Gunther Plaut always reminded us about the extraordinary response of our major philanthropists in Toronto who attended an emergency meeting at the Constellation Hotel. Within minutes, millions of dollars were raised. Our community came together as never before.

It seems that this same tradition is still as strong as it was back then. Over the years, we have steadfastly proven that we have been there for Israel in good times and in bad. There has never been a dramatic event in the life of Israel where the Jews of Toronto did not set the standard for every other Jewish community in the world.

On a more personal level, I recall during that time coming together with friends and engaging in deep political discussions. Before long, the evenings would turn into kumzitses as we began singing Naomi Shemer's Jerusalem of Gold. We learned the lyrics by heart and it almost became our second Hatikvah.

Wearing kippot also became popular overnight, and there was a clear sense that Jewish people of all ages wanted to identify with Israel in a visible way. It was almost like wearing a badge of honour that stated, "I belong to this great nation, and I am proud to be a Jew."

As I write this recollection of the Six Day War, there is a feeling of great anxiety and concern for our people and our land, without knowing the end result of the current conflict and whether we will experience the kind of euphoria that we felt in 1967. At this point, it seems very unlikely.

However, if anyone doubted the level of commitment today compared to the period following the Six-Day War, we can feel proud that hundreds of volunteers from around the world are being asked to help rehabilitate Israel's north. An international campaign is being conducted for Jews and non-Jews alike to broaden volunteer activity for Israel.

I kept putting off writing the conclusion to this article in the hope and prayer that, God willing, this war will be the one to end all future ones.

None of us get to choose the challenges in our life and the news from Israel each day is more than we can bear, but the only good news is what we see in ourselves: our passionate commitment to our homeland, our unity of purpose, our collective and individual outpouring of care, concern and sense of responsibility for one another.

It is this sense of purpose that has accompanied us throughout our history and has played a most important role in the dramatic survival of our people.

A personal awakening to Israel

By Franklyn Medjuck

Until the Six Day War in June of 1967, I had seen Israel through songs, plays and discussions at summer camp: Jews farming desert lands, draining malaria-infested swamps, living in communal dorms and eating in mess halls. Israel was the land of our forefathers now serving as a place of refuge for our fellow Jews driven out of Arab lands and fleeing war-torn Europe.

What It Was Like

For us in Halifax, Israel was quite remote, perhaps a place of curiosity to visit some day. One friend returned in 1965 from a brief tour saying "all they gave us to eat was eggplant, I hated it."

Another person found the country "very dusty and dirty." A couple of friends went for year-long programs and to our astonishment, came back speaking a modern form of Hebrew. Their stories were of a youthful energetic country, pioneering innovations, hard work and of a new Jewish culture totally different from the experiences of our North American parents and our Old-World European teachers.

When the Six Day War started, we in Halifax received very little military news about Israel. We heard rebroadcasts of Egyptian reports boasting of invading Israel and bombing Tel Aviv, of the Syrians advancing down from the Golan Heights into the Galilee, followed by Jordan who did not want to be left out of the spoils of war. No one was coming to Israel's rescue. We watched and waited painfully.

We had forgotten that a group of half-starved Jewish refugees beat back seven invading Arab armies in 1947 to achieve Israeli independence. We had forgotten the military prowess shown by Israel in the Sinai Campaign in 1956. We prayed for miracles of biblical proportions.

We began to hear the true stories of the Israeli Air Force lightning strikes that actually ended the war in the first two days and that the Arab broadcasts had been false propaganda to serve to their own masses.

For us there were many magical moments: "The Temple Mount is Ours", Shuly Natan singing Jerusalem of Gold, farmers working their fields unarmed without being shot at from the Golan Heights, the opening of the Jewish Quarter in Jerusalem, unrestricted access to the Western Wall.

For our Medjuck family, it was the first time we could access our grandfather's grave on the Mount of Olives where he had been buried during the War of Independence in 1948. Thereafter, the site lay behind Jordanian lines and all access was denied to Jews. Due to the destruction of the headstones, it took me personally another 10 years of research among the old plans and records of the 18 burial societies of Jerusalem to locate his particular burial plot and to erect a new memorial stone.

I was personally tested when Sheldon Schloss from Toronto called volunteers to help harvest Israeli crops. Selfishly, I postponed my volunteer work in order to complete my legal articles at a local law firm and to prepare for a master's program in London, England starting that fall semester. Those of my friends who did volunteer were forever changed, some for the good and some for the not so good. Ten months later, I found myself in Israel for Passover and then again in June for the anniversary of the Six Day War.

My personal awakening to the Israeli experience was the result of many factors: coming out of a foggy, rainy London; the agony of delaying the trip for so many months; reading every Israeli news item and broadcast, then landing in Tel Aviv to a brilliant sun-drenched land, dry, hot and filled with the aroma of orange blossoms and jasmine bouquets. It was overwhelming. Hearing Hebrew spoken publicly by all, seeing menorahs on top of buildings; it was surreal. Ancient Hebrew words took on new meanings: "B'seder" now meant "okay", though previously known to me as the seder for the order of the Passover meal; or "Slichah", now meaning "excuse me" or "sorry", as when you bump into someone, taken from our slichot prayer service where we ask God for forgiveness before Yom Kippur.

"Shabbos" became "Shabbat"; the Wailing Wall became the Kotel; Sunday became the first day of the work week, and all businesses closed early Friday in order "to allow people to get ready for Shabbat".

Daily shopping required knowing the religion of the store owner: a Muslim would be closed on Friday, his Shabbat, the Jewish owner closed on Saturday and the Christian owner closed on Sunday.

I experienced a burst of new Jewish music. Departing from the bonfire folk songs, now my Jewish music moved to: Jerusalem of Gold, a national anthem, and another song by Naomi Shemer, Machar (Tomorrow), and Sharm Al Sheikh (where we camped on empty beaches where now a modern city stands).....so many songs exuding a new Jewish national confidence as never before. This was followed by annual song festivals for Children's Songs, for Chassidic Songs, and for Israeli Folk Songs.

Prayers like Shema and Adon Olam transformed into modern peppy tunes with a distinctive Israeli lilt and for me, the old Hebrew liturgy came alive.

Our general opinion was that there would be a peace treaty eventually

The victorious Six Day War created such a burst of light and energy for our friends and family that new foods, music and living experiences gave rise to great Jewish pride and self-confidence, in contrast to the dark clouds lingering from the Holocaust and the anti-Semitic riots in Arab countries against their Jewish citizens.

We developed a passion for stories of Israeli ingenuity in agriculture, in military intelligence, in educating the masses of refugee immigrants, and in social programs to integrate so many diverse cultures. We were in awe of the magnitude of the humanitarian challenges.

I learned an Israeli form of humour, as they made fun of their government bureaucracy, and the foibles of the latest group of immigrants and the usual kibbutznik jokes.

A new perspective developed as to what Israeli life could be for my friends and me. Visiting Israel became the norm and to live in Israel became a viable alternative. We no longer viewed Israel as just a last chance safe haven for destitute refugees and misfits but as a place with promising career opportunities.

I had finished law school and a master's degree in town planning, so in 1970 I was hired by the City of Jerusalem to work in its urban planning unit as a development control officer.

Huge economic growth occurred from a population explosion and industrial investment. At the same time, we had to provide basic sewage treatment and water supply to the Arab settlements. In the old City of Jerusalem water was still carried by buckets and pails, while sewage flowed in the streets. Children playing in the streets suffered from all forms of infections. In one committee meeting, I recall the discussion concerned the supply of toilet paper to the public washrooms in the Old City. The local Arab residents would steal the toilet paper. It was decided to supply the toilet paper regardless, so they would hopefully realize that it would always be there for them.

One of my supervisors was an old distinguished Arab gentleman, with a long handlebar mustache. As we drove around the countryside, he declared his loyalties were strictly to the King of Jordan. He and our Arab housekeeper longed for the return of the king, not an Arafat from Egypt.

Our general opinion was that the war was defensive, not to conquer a people or a land, and that there would be a peace treaty eventually on the basis of land compromise. When driving through El Arish in northern Sinai, I picked up a hitchhiking Israeli soldier who asked in Hebrew if we were going "L'Eretz" meaning "to Israel", implying that Sinai was not part of Israel. No one intended on staying there. This came true later when Israel and Egypt signed a peace treaty at Camp David and Sinai was given to Egypt.

The Six Day War enabled us to flock to Arab towns for fruits and vegetables and deals on household supplies. It was my first exposure to Arab culture, e.g. the Arab Shuk (the retail bazaar filled with spices and crafts) where bargaining was the protocol. New eating adventures, e.g. hummus, from chick peas, with pita bread, deep-fried falafel with hot spices to burn the palate, Moroccan cigars (meat-filled spring-rolls), babaganoush (eggplant), Israeli salad (finely chopped), shishlick and shakshouka.

David Elazar and Yitzhak Rabin

The Arabs welcomed us warmly. They prospered enormously from the Israeli shoppers. They did not flee as did their predecessors. In fact, they learned English and Hebrew to do business with us. I recall spending a number of afternoons walking through Jenin with my friend Bezalel (formerly from Montreal) who moved to that area in the 1950s. He hired an architect in Jenin to do an expansion to his home. I would also join him when he sold sheep milk to the local Arabs and Bedouins. As we sat in their homes and tents, a hand would protrude from behind a curtain to serve black coffee – the hidden person never emerged in our presence. The general laughter and camaraderie during all these frequent visits was heartening. We were all quite confident that a peaceful future of good neighbourly relations and mutual prosperity lay ahead.

The memories live on!

From apprehension to concern; concern to anxiety; anxiety to deep worry; and, then, genuine fear!!!

This was the sequence of emotions in late May and early June 1967, as Egypt, Syria & Jordan began amassing troops along their borders with Israel. Was this simply a pressure tactic or was Israel, our Israel, going to once again face the military combined might of three of the most powerful Arab countries?

By Stanley Plotnick

What It Was Like

Could Israel possibly overcome such overwhelming odds? Would any country come to Israel's aid if she was attacked? How could Israel possibly survive, once again, a mass military attack in which she would be so outnumbered? What would happen to the courageous people of this tiny country that wanted nothing more than to live in peace as the homeland of the Jewish people? What would happen to Jews all over the world if Israel were defeated?

No matter how hard I tried, no matter how much confidence I had in the people of Israel, no matter how optimistic I forced myself to be, I was genuinely frightened. In fact, at times the fear became obsessive.

It seems unbelievable that today, 40 years later, these emotions return. Not because Israel seems as vulnerable, or because it is likely that Egypt or Jordan would return to war against Israel, but because there exist violent, compulsive enemies who are more committed than ever to the obliteration of Israel, and even, possibly, of the Jewish people.

They still will not allow us to have our homeland, albeit a tiny piece of land that is a fraction of even the smallest Arab country. And, because there exists a hatred of western values and democracy, Iran, Syria, fundamentalist Muslim movements and their puppet terrorist militias, believe it is most acceptably expressed through a determination to "eradicate" Israel as a prelude to eliminating all other vestiges of freedom and tolerance. And, today, as 40 years ago, Israel is battling enemies for no reason other than their compulsion that "we shall not survive." And the fears return for those who must endure the attacks, live in shelters, and lose their loved ones who once again must defend Israel for all Jews wherever we are, for whenever we might want, or need, to move to our "homeland." And I cry for each life that is lost....for each family that is traumatized, for I feel as though each is almost my child, my grandchild, my family.

> I try to remain optimistic today, as 40 years ago, for who could have imagined the progress of the six days of war in 1967?

But I try to remain optimistic today, as 40 years ago, for who could have imagined the progress of the six days of war in 1967? Who could have foreseen the pre-emptive military brilliance of the IDF? Who could have predicted the unrelenting courage and determination of the Israeli people? Who could have believed that we the Jewish people would not back down, would not "take it" again, and that despite the enormous cost, in six days we would prevail?

Who could have foretold that those who were determined to "drive us into the sea" would be calling for a ceasefire? Who would have envisioned that this military victory would form the foundation of a peace, albeit a cool peace, with Egypt and Jordan? Who could have dreamed that the plan for Arab destruction of Israel would lead to the fulfillment of the eternal Jewish hope for the re-unification of Jerusalem?

And who could have understood what this would mean for every Jew? At no time in modern history would Jews stand prouder, freer, or be treated more respectfully. Who would have imagined what was possible when the Arab armies began moving on the borders of Israel, and each of us was gripped with fear, approaching terror?

Those weeks are forever ingrained in my mind, heart and soul....the life-changing emotions beginning with apprehension and moving to deep fear and gradually to optimism, relief and even some excitement and pride. But who knew then that we would have to face these fearful, tearful, times, again and again.

We prayed then, as we do now, that this will be the last time; that we will be allowed to live in peace and security; that we will be able to bring science and technology and our values to all mankind, and that we, and our neighbours, can live side by side with understanding and tolerance.

But perhaps that is too optimistic....and the terror felt 40 years ago may be repeated yet again. I pray not!

Stanley Plotnick is the former president of UIA Federations Canada.

IN A STATE OF CONTEMPLATION: Yitzhak Rabin and Moshe Dayan seem calm and at ease as they contemplate the events of the war. [IGPO]

After 40 years, it is timely to recall

"Time is the longest distance between two places." –Tennessee Williams, The Glass Menagerie

By Rabbi Erwin Schild

On Reflection

Last May, I noticed how time impacts on geography. I was escorting a congregational Israel tour, and we were heading out of Jerusalem. I reminded our guide to point out to my group where the Mandelbaum Gate had been when Jerusalem was a divided city. Excellent guide though he was, I had the feeling he would not show us this site, and the lack of interest on the part of my group members would have justified the omission.

It was obvious that Mandelbaum Gate had little meaning for the men and women in the bus. Evidently neither the older nor the younger ones remembered, or had never heard of, the Mandelbaum Gate. In 1970, when I led my first congregational tour to Israel, the Mandelbaum Gate and how it had disappeared was still fresh in Jewish memories. But its site still aroused curiosity this year; my fellow travellers were craning their necks to see the place through the bus windows. It was not necessary then to remind a guide to point out the spot.

The Mandelbaum Gate, like Checkpoint Charlie in Berlin, was the wormhole connecting world to anti-world. It was the passage - not really a gate but an opening – in a barbwire barricade controlled by United Nations personnel through which diplomats and international notables were able to pass between Israeli Jerusalem and the Jordanian-held part of the city.

Forty years ago, the Mandelbaum Gate disappeared. Forty years are a long time in collective and individual memory. Forty years meant generational change when the Children of Israel trekked from Egypt to the Promised Land. The desert they crossed was the stage on which the drama unfolded that swept the Mandelbaum Gate away.

After 40 years, it is timely, therefore, to recall and retell: "Arma virumque cano" to sing of arms and the men who were the heroes of the drama and to hear or read the reminiscences of our elders, who as spectators were gripped by the agony and the ecstasy of the Jewish world of 1967.

The Mandelbaum Gate epitomizes the State of Israel before the Six Day War. Although the boundaries of Israel, set in 1948 on the battlefields of the War of Independence, were more generous than the bizarre projection of the original United Nations partition plan, they left the country in limbo. The borders were tight; narrow like a road without shoulders. Israel's geography was precarious, tentative, incomplete.

Tourists did not linger long in its capital Jerusalem. The city felt surrounded and truncated. A wall went through its centre. The eastern exposure of the King David Hotel was indeed exposed: it overlooked a no-man's land across which the Jordanian troops loved to take shots. Mount Scopus, site of the Hebrew University and the Hadassah Hospital –pride of the pre-state Yishuv– was cut off from the city. Though held by the Israel Defence Forces, it was inaccessible, its garrison resupplied every two weeks under UN supervision. Secret meetings of Israeli leaders with the King Hussein of Jordan took place, but neither Egypt, nor Syria or Jordan, accepted the permanence of a Jewish state. Instead they abetted the activities of terrorists operating from their territories. Israel's relations to her neighbours were low-grade warfare flaring up from time to time in sharp military confrontations.

The Suez campaign of 1956, though aborted under the pressure of the United States, was followed by a period of relative stability. The boisterous threats of Arab spokesmen, especially Egyptian and Syrian, were discounted by Jews in the Diaspora as empty rhetoric to salve Arab sensibilities. We watched the fortunes of Israel with a mixture of admiration and anxiety, hope and worry. A new campus of the Hebrew University grew in west Jerusalem and a new Hadassah Hospital was opened. The ingathering of the exiles continued as Jews from north Africa and Holocaust survivors in eastern Europe made their way to the homeland.

A UN peacekeeping force, the United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF), was stationed in the Sinai Peninsula to keep the peace between Egypt and Israel. Contrary to international assurances, the Suez Canal remained closed to Israeli shipping. Eilat, at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, was developed as Israel's southern marine terminal.

At Israel's northern borders the situation was less stable. Terrorists, with Syrian support, carried out raids, while Syrian artillery emplacements on the Golan Heights, overlooking the Sea of Galilee and the Hule Valley, subjected Israeli villages and kibbutzim to periodic shelling. Tractors working the land had to be armoured for protection. People were forced to sleep in underground bomb shelters.

Abba Eban, foreign minister of Israel, summed it all up in his address to the UN General Assembly on June 19, 1967: "As we look back, it becomes plain that the Arab governments regarded the 1957 arrangements merely as a breathing space enabling them to gather strength for a later assault."

The year 1967 saw an increase of Syrian harassment, although on April 7, Syria suffered an embarrassing defeat in an aerial skirmish, losing six MiG-21s to the Israeli Air Force. Egypt showed increased impatience with the presence of the UNEF in the Sinai peninsula. The level of Jewish worries about Israel's security rose with the growing tension. The scene was set.

Our hearts went out to our brothers and sisters

On May 16, the Egyptian commander-in-chief requested the UNEF in the Sinai to vacate posts on the Egyptian border, which were then promptly occupied by Egyptian troops. Two days later, the Egyptian foreign minister requested all countries whose soldiers were serving in the UNEF to withdraw their contingents. India and Yugoslavia complied promptly. On May 19, Egypt notified the United Nations that their mission in Sinai and in the Gaza strip was terminated. The remaining United Nations forces meekly withdrew. The Sinai peninsula was occupied by Egyptian troops. Tanks and infantry were massing on Israel's southern border.

Then an even more flagrant challenge was announced by Egypt: the Straits of Tiran, the narrow maritime passage through which vessels bound for or from Eilat have to pass, was closed to Israeli shipping at Sharm al Sheikh as of May 23. Israel was cut off from its southern supply and trade routes.

The Israeli economy ground to a halt as the country prepared to defend itself. Diplomatic activity intensified among the powers who had promised Israel open sea lanes and security behind the shield of United Nations forces.

We Jews in Canada remembered the oath "never again"and rallied to Israel's defence. We lobbied, we protested, we cried out, we agonized. Our hearts went out to our brothers and sisters whose survival was again at stake.

In a speech to Arab trade union-ists on May 26, Gamal Abdul Nasser, the president of Egypt, revealed what everyone already knew: "Our basic objective will be to destroy Israel."

Sympathy will not be enough

On May 23, the Israeli cabinet dispatched Eban to Washington, after deciding to wait 48 hours before taking action on the closing of Tiran. The United States government, as well as Soviet Premier Alexei Kosygin, warned Israel to await the outcome of more negotiations. Israel gave in, agreeing to postpone action for two weeks. And then what? To us Jews in Toronto, the situation appeared desperate.

A huge, impressive demonstration in support for Israel in New York on Sunday afternoon rallied thousands of Jewish men, women and children, along with other sympathizers. But sympathy will not be enough!

I had a vantage point from which to watch the action or inaction. Providence – or was it merely a fortuitous coincidence?– decreed that I should be in Washington from May 28 to June 1. Each year, the Rabbinical Assembly of America holds a convention in May. It was usually held at one of the renowned hotels in the Catskills, the Concord or Grossinger's, conveniently close to the large number of rabbis in the American northeast, and offering the rabbis and their wives – there were no female rabbis yet – enjoyable creature comforts while attending to the business of the Conservative rabbinate. In 1966, however, it was decided to hold the 1967 convention at the Shoreham Hotel in Washington, in order to focus the attention of Congress members and other politicians and pundits on a number of current issues of concern to American rabbis.

The president of the Rabbinical Assembly, Rabbi Eli Bohnen, a Canadian expatriate, expressed in his opening address what we all felt: fate had decreed that this convention should be held in Washington at this time of Israel's great need. None of us had known that we would be meeting under a cloud of concern for the fate of Israel. The nations of the world were being tested, the rabbi said, but most of all, the Jews of America were being tested. How much are we prepared to do, he asked, for the Jews of Israel?

Rabbi Usher Kirshblum – the father of the cantor of my synagogue – suggested we capture the imagination of the country with a march on the Capitol by the entire convention, about 500 people. However, the delegates were to listen first to a report by Mr. Kenen, one of the chief lobbyists for Israel in the American capital. Today, 40 years later, I understand better what he explained to the assembled rabbis: everybody agreed that Egypt was in breach of all prior agreements, but action to help Israel was held up by the debate between those who called for unilateral action by the United States, such as sending an American ship bound for Israel through the Straits of Tiran, and their opponents who advocated to wait for multilateral measures under the umbrella of the United Nations. Clearly, Jews faced the challenge to mobilize public opinion in favour of immediate material support for Israel.

Every Jew was desperate for news

Needless to say, the crisis in the Middle East overshadowed the entire convention. Nothing else seemed to be of significance. New developments heightened the tension. On Tuesday, May 30, the Kingdom of Jordan joined a five-year military alliance with Egypt and placed its own forces under Egyptian command. Syria had already entered a pact with Egypt. President Nasser gloated: "The armies of Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon are poised on the borders of Israel... while standing behind us are the armies of Iraq, Algeria, Kuwait, Sudan and the whole Arab nation. This act will astound the world."

Fear crept into our bones. We worried about Israel's narrow waist – 17 miles only separated forces now under Egyptian command from Israel's coastline near Netanya.

On the same day, Radio Cairo came up with a gruesome analysis. "In the light of the blockade of the Gulf of Aqaba, two possibilities are open to Israel, each one soaked in blood: either she will die from strangulation of the Arab military and economic blockade, or she will die in a hail of bullets of the Arab forces surrounding her."

Before Iraq, too, joins the military alliance, its president makes a prediction: "My sons, this day is the day of battle and revenge for your brothers who fell in 1948. It is the day of the removal of the shame. With the help of God, we will meet together in Tel Aviv and Haifa."

The convention highlight was a public rally on Tuesday afternoon in conjunction with the Jewish Community Council of Greater Washington. The Shoreham Hotel ballroom was filled to overflowing.

My sermon on the following Shabbat, June 3, was mainly a report on the convention and the rally. Vice-president Hubert Humphrey, whose appearance at the convention had been scheduled many months in advance, spoke with great forthrightness as he assured the assembly that the United States would stand behind its commitments. He appreciated Israel's restraint. "Every effort –underscore every– will be made to find a peaceful settlement, but not at the expense of Israel's security."

Senator Eugene McCarthy, one of the most powerful political figures of the time, stated that while an Egyptian attack would have to be met by Israel, access to the Gulf of Aqaba was not Israel's but America's problem. Israel's access to the oceans was not only a legal but also a moral commitment. "There is no significant division... in the Congress or in the Senate... with reference to our ultimate obligation and responsibility."

The senator tried sincerely to instil confidence in the hearts of his rapt listeners, and I tried to convey the same message to my congregation. But mainly I tried, as did practically all religious and secular leaders of our community, to rouse our community to mobilize. An emergency fund had been set up to support the 2½ million Israelis who were facing 40 million hostile Arabs. Three hundred young Jewish people from Philadelphia had left a week before for Israel to help out. "Are there sacrifices we are not prepared to make to save 2½ million Jews from destruction?" I asked rhetorically. "Our young people have marched and sat-in for others; now let us protest for ourselves!"

Another day or two went by. Around us, we sensed a terrifying silence. Was this going to be another abandonment of the Jews? There had been words of support, but not enough and no action. Several prominent U.S. clergymen had released a "Declaration of Conscience" in the New York Times. But there was no outburst of public solidarity with Israel. How will little Israel defend itself against superior odds? Her enemies on every side had tightened the noose. Their objective was clear: 19 years before they had been unable to snuff out the life of nascent Israel. Now they were going to destroy her. The world seemed to be watching in paralyzed silence for Israel's execution. No action; merely futile diplomatic maneuvering. All that our efforts had produced were words, expressions of sympathy. I almost choked on my anger.

Then it was Monday, June 5. I was in my car, I remember. Switch on the radio; time for the news. Every Jew was desperate for the news. What's happening? Death or life?

An electrifying news item. Could we believe it? Israeli warplanes, in a daring but successful raid, had destroyed the entire Egyptian Air Force parked on the tarmac of the military airbase near Cairo, attacking while the Egyptian pilots were eating lunch. Could it be true? Confirmation was quick to come. Yes, in a daring pre-emptive strike, Israel had won undisputed mastery of the air. The skies over Israel, Sinai and Egypt were ours

"Why is your clothing so red,/ Your garments like his who treads grapes?/ I trod a vintage alone;/ Of the peoples no man was with me./ I trod them down in my anger,/ Trampled them in my rage./ Their life-blood bespattered my garments/ And all my clothing was stained.../ I looked, but there was none to help;/ I stared, but there was none to aid –/ So my own arm wrought the triumph,/ And my own rage was my aid." (Isaiah 63:2 ff.)

The next few days were a blur of good news of victories. Rapid moves on the battlefields. The rout of Egyptian army, their smashed tanks littering the sands, their soldiers running away. Israeli forces advanced across the Sinai, teaching us distant spectators a new geography: Mitla Pass, Santa Katarina and strategic Sharm al Sheikh, where mobile Israeli forces dismantled the Egyptian artillery pieces controlling the narrow straits of Tiran, lifting the blockade of the vitally important Gulf of Aqaba.

A desperate Nasser implored Jordan's King Hussein to move on to west Jerusalem to relieve the pressure on Egypt. Bitter battles with Jordanian forces ensued. Many brave Israeli soldiers fell at Ammunition Hill, a fortified Jordanian position that the Israel Defence Forces has to capture in order to wrest the old city from the Jordanians.

The war had started on Monday, June 5. When I addressed a rally for the Israel Emergency Fund at Adath Israel synagogue on Thursday evening, June 8, east Jerusalem and the Western Wall were already "ours."

We were rejoicing in a phenomenal victory of the few over the many. I emphasized a fact that remains as important today as it was 40 years ago: the existential inequality of the struggle that had been forced on Israel. Israel's defeat would have meant its destruction. The Arabs, even in abject defeat, were reassured by the support of the Soviet Union and the oil-rich Arab states, which lost no time to call for an urgent ceasefire that was also the policy objective of the United States.

Along with paying tribute to Israel's heroic armed forces, I pointed to the loneliness of Israel, its psychological isolation. It can count on one ally only: the Jewish people. In the lead-up to the war, most of the world powers had stood by, as they had when Hitler had threatened and proceeded to carry out the annihilation of European Jewry. Israel received only verbal comfort and the counsel to be patient while the UNEF was evicted, Arab armies mobilized and Eilat was blockaded.

I spoke bitterly of the pious hypocrisy of France and Britain who had just announced that they had cut off delivery of military supplies to Israel for the sake of peace.

When six million Jews went to their death, we could do nothing, I said. Would we not have made any sacrifice to save them if we had been able? Now we are able to alleviate the devastating human and material losses that the war inflicted on Israel.

The war was not yet over. The Syrian army was still on the Golan Heights, their guns spewing death and destruction on northern Israel. In a brilliant move, the Israeli forces accomplished what seemed impossible: the conquest of the Golan mountains and the slopes of Mount Lebanon overlooking the Sea of Galilee, the northern rift valley. Six days had gone by when a United Nations ceasefire was accepted.

We felt that the United Nations had really lost any vestige of moral authority. Unable to restrain Egypt, Jordan and Syria, it now turned its pressure on victorious Israel. I remember feeling mostly contempt when listening to UN Secretary General U Thant's reports to the Security Council, quibbling whether or not an Israeli column had been observed moving into Kuneitra, a Syrian stronghold, before or after the ceasefire deadline.

An interesting footnote to the liberation and unification of Jerusalem was written by the Vatican in Rome. Pope Paul VI appealed to Israel to protect the holy places in the city. I voiced my indignation in my sermon on the Shabbat, which coincided with the end of the fighting. Why had the Vatican not appealed to Jordan against the exclusion of Jewish visitors to the Jewish holy places in Jerusalem? Why concern for the safety of religious sites when Jews were taking over their protection and accessibility? And were the Egyptian and Syrian threats of an impending bloodbath in Israel not just as worthy of papal concern as the misplaced worry for the city's sanctuaries?

Diaspora Jews felt new pride in Israel's prowess on the field of battle. The war had been an incredible dramatic reversal. Time magazine devoted a major cover article to an admiring analysis of Israel's conduct of the Six Day War.

The war had far-reaching political, psychological and theological dimensions. We still live with the political consequences of Israel's astounding victory that gave it control over the Sinai peninsula, the Gaza strip and the entire West Bank of the Jordan. I admit that I was disappointed with what I considered Israel's failure to promptly take political advantage of the dramatically changed political reality. Listening to the eloquent speeches of Eban and other political leaders in the wake of the war, and observing first-hand on a tour of the West Bank areas not only the wrecks of Jordanian tanks flanking the road to Jericho but especially the evident subservient acceptance of Israel's dominance by the local Arab population, I had expected Israel to arrive speedily at a permanent settlement with its defeated foes.

While my competence as political analyst is admittedly questionable, I could not and did not evade my responsibilities as a rabbi to find a religious dimension in the miraculous reversal of Israel's fortune. The festival of Shavuot, celebrating the Revelation in the wilderness of Sinai, occurred a mere four days after the end of the war. In the interval, access from Jewish Jerusalem to the Old City and its Jewish holy places, notably the Kotel, the Western Wall, had been secured. Citizens and visitors, for the first time since Israel's independence, were able to enter the city and celebrate the festival in the Holy City.

Clearly, the unexpectedly swift victory over its enemies confirmed again that you cannot decipher Jewish history without perceiving the workings of a supernatural element. The events of the Six Day War were of biblical proportions and could have been described in a biblical style: God smiting the transmissions of the enemy tanks so that they could not move. To the religious observer, the strong hand of God was unmistakable in the great victory, though it was achieved by Israel's brilliance and valour.

Even the Soviet representatives' vituperations and invective directed at Israel at the United Nations made sense only if Israel was not just an ordinary little country of 2½ million people. Israel is God's stake in human history, I said in my Shavuot sermon.

I spoke of two consequences of our "near-death" experience.

I predicted an enhanced feeling of Jewish unity, a closer bond between the Jews of Israel and of the Diaspora, the Golah. I also foresaw a Jewish withdrawal into ourselves, a turning inward. I predicted a resurgence of Jewish piety. On Shavuot, the festival commemorating an ancient commitment made by our ancestors, I looked forward to a renewed commitment to Jewish ideals and the Jewish religious way of life,

The Six Day War brought permanent changes

a protest against a treacherous world to whom we had given so much of our spiritual energy and resources. The moment called for an act of simple self-assertion, of our will to live.

In 1968, Rabbi Solomon Sharfman, chairman of the Commission on International Affairs of the Synagogue Council of America, looked back at the Jewish response to the events of May and June 1967. He wrote the following: "Jews everywhere reacted to [the events of May and June 1967] with a depth of feeling as though their own lives and fortunes hung in the balance, and many discovered in themselves for the first time an attachment to the Land of Israel which they had not known existed."

The icy silence that surrounded Jews at the time of their greatest need before Israel's spectacular success could not but direct Jews to their own inner resources. True, there were individual Christian voices expressing support and sympathy for Israel, but there was no groundswell of Christian support and succor to hearten Jews in the terrible crisis.

For religious Zionists – and I consider myself as one –the Six Day Victory was part of a progressive redemption of the people Israel, of G'ulah. Rabbi Shubert Spero, a leading Orthodox rabbi of the time, maintained that the Six Day War related to Israel's War of Independence 19 years earlier in the same way as the biblical parting of the Red Sea related to the Exodus. It brought a sense of closure. We now experienced a feeling of completeness: Jerusalem united, possession of the Temple Mount, Israel enlarged to the fullness of the biblical boundaries. What happened and how it happened indicated the presence of the hand of God. It was God who brought Israel from the threat of immediate and total annihilation to triumph and salvation, Rabbi Spero explained.

It had always been my belief that the State of Israel belongs to our redemptive history. Only non-Zionists – if such still existed after June 1967– and religious literalists would continue to disagree.

The Six Day War experience triggered a Jewish renaissance. We were more proud of being Jewish than before. The world tried to compensate for its shameful silence by acclaiming things Jewish in popular culture, in music, literature and academic curricula. Jewish was "in."

Synagogues of all trends flourished and new ones were founded. Jewish day schools proliferated, not only in the Conservative and Orthodox community but also in the Reform community and in the more secular streams. Even Jews who found it difficult to regard a secular Jewish state as related to the traditional concept of redemption may have been subliminally affected. Was not the spectacular development of Chabad and its intensifying expectation of the immediate coming of the Mashiach facilitated and furthered by messianic associations of Israel's miraculous victory? In any case, our own Jewish community of Canada entered an era of growing self-confidence. The spirit of the State of Israel, its self-reliance, its glorious triumph rolled off the secret shame of the Holocaust. The image of the Jew going to his doom without resisting faded before the brighter image of the Israeli paratrooper.

Across the distance of 40 years, we hopefully realize how many of the changes wrought by the Six Day War remain with us and may be permanently embedded in Jewish self-awareness. Many values created or confirmed in the crucible of crisis and victory are the legacy inherited by the younger generation. Among them are certainly our firm bonds with the Jewish state and the unshakable will to proudly live as Jews.

Rabbi Erwin Schild is the rabbi emeritus of the Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto.

JERUSALEM OF GOLD

By Naomi Shemer

and in later life

As clear as wine, the wind is flying
Among the dreamy pines
As evening light is slowly dying
And a lonely bell still chimes,
So many songs, so many stories
The stony hills recall ...
Around her heart my city carries
A lonely ancient wall.
Yerushalaim all of gold
Yerushalaim, bronze and light
Within my heart I shall treasure
Your song and sight.
Alas, the dry wells and fountains,
Forgotten market-day
The sound of horn from Temple's mountain
No longer calls to pray,
The rocky caves at night are haunted
By sounds of long ago
When we were going to the Jordan
By way of Jericho.
Yerushalaim all of gold
Yerushalaim, bronze and light
Within my heart I shall treasure
Your song and sight.

But when I come to count your praises
And sing Hallel to you
With pretty rhymes I dare not crown you
As other poets do,
Upon my lips is always burning
Your name, so dear, so old:
If I forget Yerushalaim
Of bronze and light and gold ...
Yerushalaim all of gold
Yerushalaim, bronze and light
Within my heart I shall treasure
Your song and sight.
Back to the wells and to the fountains
Within the ancient walls
The sound of horn from Temple's mountain
Again so loudly calls,
From rocky caves, this very morning
A thousand suns will glow
And we shall go down to the Jordan
By way of Jericho.
Yerushalaim all of gold
Yerushalaim, bronze and light
Within my heart I shall treasure
Your song and sight.

The 'Good' Old Days – The Better New Days

By Rabbi Reuven Bulka

On Reflection

As I write this, we are, once again, in the aftermath of a bitter war. I think this is the 10th since 1948. Is there a precedent for a country going to battle so often, yet able to achieve so enormously over the same time?

By "achieve," I am not referring to military success. I am referring to decades of unprecedented excellence in the most difficult circumstance of being under the constant threat of enemies hell bent on Israel's being annihilated. Israel is, incredibly, a high tech superpower, and an international leader in busting through medical frontiers. All this has unfolded even as our best and brightest have given their lives in defence of Israel, and at the very least have dedicated their most productive years to military service.

We remember the wars. How can we forget? The War of Independence, The Suez War, The Yom Kippur War, the War of Attrition, all stand out. But none stand out more than the Six Day War. And those of us who are "old" enough to have been around at that time will remember it for our entire lives.

Who cannot remember the momentous events leading up to the Six Day War, the anxiety over Israel's future, and the euphoria over Israel's future?

Who cannot remember? Those who were not around then, or were too young to appreciate this critical moment in Jewish history. In other words, if you are less than 50 years old, the Six Day War is just part of Israel's history. But if you are more than 50, or into your 60s, as I am, then the Six Day War is living history.

There is great anxiety now for Israel, but a different type of anxiety. In 1967, it was anxiety about the immediate fate of Israel. With the armies amassed against it, Israel was in clear and present danger of being wiped off the face of the earth.

President Nasser of Egypt, to his credit, did not equivocate. He was very explicit. He stated that the Arabs' goal was "the full restoration of the rights of the Palestinian people. In other words, we aim at the destruction of the State of Israel. The immediate aim: perfection of Arab military might. The national aim: the eradication of Israel."

Remember the Nasser understanding of what "restoration of the rights of the Palestinian people" means. For him, it was unambiguous, and he had no hesitation in spelling it out, graphically and without fudging.

I have little doubt that some who employ this phrase today have the same understanding as Nasser, though they may not be as open and honest about it. But we ignore this interpretation at our own peril. Certainly, there was great peril then, in 1967.

In the period leading up to the war, there were escalating provocations, including almost as many fedayeen terrorist raids into Israel in the first four months of 1967 (37) as in the entire previous year (41).

Who can forget the attacks on Israeli kibbutzim from the Golan Heights, with many communities living in dread of being shelled by Syria. It is no surprise that a terror group aided and abetted by Syria is doing the exact same thing to Northern Israel in our time.

Toward the end of May 1967, on May 22 at night, Nasser closed the Straits of Tiran to all Israeli shipping and to all ships that were bound for Eilat. This was a clear violation of the Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, which had been adopted by the UN Conference of the Law of the Sea on April 27, 1958. This action by Nasser cut off Israel's only supply route to Asia and stopped the delivery of oil from Israel's main supplier of oil, none other than, believe it or not – Iran. Diplomatic efforts to re-open the straights were going nowhere.

This action was unquestionably a call to war, as Nasser said very clearly, in following the blockade with a challenge to Israel to make war.

Things started to move more rapidly into war mode. Jordan signed a defence pact with Egypt on May 30. King Hussein placed his army, on both sides of the Jordan River, under Egyptian command. Remember that by doing this he was only the third party in the ring. Syria had already formed a military alliance with Egypt in 1966.

As if this was not enough to send shivers of worry down the Jewish spine, on June 4 Iraq joined this military alliance. The president of Iraq joined with the following offensive rationale: "The existence of Israel is an error which must be rectified. This is our opportunity to wipe out the ignominy which has been with us since 1948. Our goal is clear – to wipe Israel off the map."

As rhetoric, it is scary enough. And we ignore these threats, then and now, at great risk to our existence. When the rhetoric is backed up with 465,000 troops, close to 3,000 tanks, and over 800 aircraft, it is not surprising that the Jewish community was living in great fear for the future.

I had not yet come to Ottawa. I first arrived in September 1967. But one of the first things I heard was about the emotional meeting of the community, which gathered to show support for Israel and to raise an incredible amount of money to help the beleaguered state.

I recall vividly how Israel begged Jordan to stay out

It was also as a result of this great threat to Israel that theological literature coming just after the war devoted much attention to the question of whether Judaism could survive the destruction of Israel, or did Israel's disappearance signal the end of Judaism. This is how real the danger actually was, and how much it had penetrated our collective psyche.

At the time, the numbers were not in Israel's favour. Israel had 50,000 troops, and another 200,000 plus mobilized reservists, and about 200 combat aircraft (actually, 197).

So, the stage was set, and it was a scary stage. Israel had to contend with a belligerent Egypt bent on war, an equally belligerent Syria, the prospect of Jordan joining the war; and Lebanon, Iraq, Algeria, Kuwait, Sudan, indeed the whole Arab nation, in Nasser's words, ready to obliterate Israel.

Perhaps the major worry was Egypt's air force, 450 strong, and relatively new. The TU-16 Badger bombers were of particular concern, as they were capable of inflicting heavy damage, in military and civilian centres.

Early on June 5, 1967, Israel sent out all but 12 of its combat aircraft in a mass attack on Egypt's airfields. They succeeded beyond their wildest dreams, taking out 300 aircraft and 100 combat pilots, and, through tarmac-shredding penetration bombs, rendering the rest of Egypt's air force all but useless for the duration of the war. Most war historians consider this to have been the turning point in the war. With total air superiority, Israel was in a great position.

We later learned that part of Israel's success was due to advanced training in rapid refitting of aircraft returning from sorties, allowing for up to four sorties a day from the same plane, as opposed to the one to two sorties by the enemy. The effect of this was so overwhelming that the Arabs claimed Israel was aided by foreign air forces. It is true that we were being aided, but not by foreign forces.

On the ground, Israel used brilliant and innovative tactics to outmaneuver the Egyptian force in the Sinai which included about 100,000 troops and over 900 tanks. By June 8, the Sinai was captured.

On the Syrian front, Israel managed to destroy two-thirds of Syria's air force during the evening of June 5. At great risk, since they were facing an army of about 75,000 well supported by artillery and armour, Israel captured the Golan Heights by June 10.

I remember then the thrill of hearing that Israel had effectively warded off the threat to its existence with the precision pre-emptive air strikes. But all this was secondary to the happenings in Jerusalem. I recall quite vividly how Israel begged Jordan to stay out of the way. Israel promised not to attack Jordan unless attacked first. Jordan did not immediately join the fray, even though it had just signed a defence pact with Egypt and had placed its army under Egyptian command.

The Western Wall as it appeared before June 5, 1967.

Egypt managed to convince Jordan that it was actually winning the war, so Jordan should join the victory celebration. But it was a blatant, and for Jordan, a costly lie. Jordan attacked Israel, and Israel responded, destroying the meager Jordanian Air Force and strategically outthinking the potent Jordanian army with its 300 modern tanks.

In Jerusalem, Israel counter-attacked on June 6, and by June 7, Mordechai Gur's paratroopers entered the old city via the Lion's Gate, capturing the Western Wall and the Temple Mount. Who can forget the excitement of that moment, of Uzi Narkiss, Moshe Dayan, and Yitzhak Rabin marching through to these holy places, and of the then Chief Rabbi, Rav Shlomo Goren, sounding the memorable shofar blast. What a moment in Jewish history, a moment that put such a redemptive perspective on our 2,000 year exile.

Do we really comprehend this sea change in Jewish life?

By the end of the war, on June 11, the people who made their money selling maps must have lost a fortune. Israel had captured the Gaza Strip, the Sinai Peninsula, the West Bank of the Jordan River, and the Golan Heights. And, it had recaptured its glory from the travails of its history.

A week earlier, the mood across the Jewish world was an overdose of worry and anxiety. A week later, the worry and anxiety had literally exploded into an incredible euphoria, a euphoria reserved for the unexpected, for the miraculous deliverance from doom..

In the aftermath of the war, Israel's National Unity government voted unanimously to return the Sinai to Egypt and the Golan Heights to Syria, in return for nothing more, or less, than peace treaties with these two countries. Of course, a return to the status quo of Syrian shelling of Israeli border towns and a continuation of the blockade of the Straights of Tiran was unacceptable, but that would have been a non-issue if peace could have ensued.

This was not a war that Israel wanted, but the decisive victory stands out as the most memorable moment since the re-establishment of the State of Israel. There were heavy losses, in proportion twice as many as the United States lost in eight years of war in Vietnam (777 dead, 2,586 wounded), which make any celebration after a war muted at best. Besides, we can never be happy at being forced to kill others. And we never are.

This may sound odd, but to me one of the most sacred places in Jerusalem is Ammunition Hill. It was there that the critical battle for Jerusalem reached its critical stage, where heroic young Israeli soldiers, fully cognizant of the background to the fight, fought valiantly to take the hill, and thereby control Jerusalem. The stories of soldiers riddled with bullets climbing up to the top to destroy Jordanian bunker positions are legendary. The losses were severe, but the heroism inspirational.

Much has changed since those unforgettable days. With Jerusalem once again united, we have a new celebrative day in our calendar, Yom Yerushalayim, which I consider the antidote to the fast of Asarah B'Tevet, the 10th of Tevet, which commemorates the day when Jerusalem was cut off from Israel in the period leading up to the destruction of the Holy Sanctuary (Beit Hamikdash).

They never gave up hope for the future

It is still frustrating, if not maddening, that aside from Israel itself, only Micronesia recognizes Jerusalem as the capital of Israel (Costa Rica and El Salvador recently decided to move their embassies to Tel Aviv.) Our history is turbulent, and even after the re-establishment of Jerusalem as effectively a redress of history, the turbulence continues. When will it end?

Conventional wisdom has it that the safest place to be during a hurricane is right in the eye of the hurricane. I have never tried it, so I can not vouch for it. But I wonder what is the safest place to be in the unfolding of history? In its eye? In the eye, we probably will miss the real power of the historical momentum. In hurricanes, that is good; in history, not so good.

Watching it from a distance, we may have a better perspective, but not necessarily a full perspective. I include myself with those who were around when Jerusalem was re-united, who were excited when it happened, who appreciate what happened to this very day...but I suspect not as fully as I should appreciate it.

Do we really comprehend this sea change in Jewish life, that we, in our lifetime, are able to live out the dreams that our ancestors prayed for, but not in their wildest imagination thought it could happen in the dark days of their travail, when to survive was the main object of their concern. Yes, they never gave up hope for the future, but that future is us.

How do we show our appreciation to our ancestors for never giving up? How do we avoid the complacency of taking all this for granted? For openers, I think we all have a sacred obligation, no matter what the level of our religious affirmation, to make Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day), celebrating the re-unification of Jerusalem, a special day in our calendar.

We need not get bogged down in the debate over whether or not to recite Hallel, the unique praise and thanks to God, on this day. Suffice it to say that there are a full range of views on this, from no Hallel, to Hallel without the before-and-after blessings, to Hallel with all the blessings.

There is room to accommodate all these views, but no room to accommodate complacency, or the refusal to recognize the special nature of this day and to instead treat it like any other day. There are so many controversy-free ways of making this a special day. We can recite the psalms that make reference to and extol Jerusalem. We can gather our children around a festive meal, with items like Yerushalmi Kugel, and tell them the story of how we were blessed to have Jerusalem re-unified in our time.

Jerusalem is once again the epicentre of Jewish life

We can gather the videos of that great historical moment, and show them to our families. And we can, and should, bring to our table people who were around at that time, who remember what it was like when the Western Wall was not accessible to Jews, who can share what this truly means.

It was our historical sensitivity that was at work whenever we prayed for the return to Jerusalem. That sensitivity needs to continue, in our praying that the Jerusalem to which we returned remains intact. We dare not behave in a way that makes us unworthy of our redemptive history. Such lackadaisicality, such callousness, would distort who we are and renounce the very values that made the return possible.

Jerusalem is once again the epicentre of Jewish life. And how it has flourished since 1967. And how it has become, under Israel's governance, a place where all religions can visit their venerated places.

The yearning for the Jerusalem of old has given way to the melodic Jerusalem of Gold. These are the true Golden years of Jewish history, if only we live by the gold standard of remembrance and appreciation.

Personal recollections of a heroic time

On Reflection

By Michael Brown

For me, 1966-'67 was the kind of year students dream of: full of adventure, exotic travel, serious learning, the company of good friends, and even paid employment (not so lucrative but very interesting).

It began with a job as a counsellor with the Ramah Seminar in Israel, sharing with bright, eager North American high-schoolers the Israel I had come to love and feel at home in during earlier summers and then a year-long stint as an English teacher in a rural high school and high-school yeshiva.

Following the Seminar came a madcap drive from Copenhagen to Jerusalem with Ed Feld, a good friend and a classmate at the Jewish Theological Seminary: we spent Rosh Hashanah in Munich; Yom Kippur in Aix-en-Provence, France; Sukkot in Trieste, Italy; Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah in Istanbul. We had chosen those destinations because they had functioning Jewish communities, no certain thing in post-Holocaust Europe.

From Istanbul, we headed across the Anatolian Peninsula, pausing for a night in Ankara to visit a friend who was a rabbi-chaplain at a U.S. base there. The last stop in Turkey was a sleepy town named Antakia, which, to our surprise, turned out to be ancient Antioch, the capital of Antiochus IV. That Antioch was now a dusty village seemed a just fate for the arrogant villain of the Chanukah story. That it was the launching pad for our journey into "enemy" territory seemed portentous.

The crossing into Syria was uneventful. Our visas were in order; the luggage wasn't searched, so our tallitot, tfillin and siddurim went undetected. We had assumed the customs inspectors wouldn't know what they were in any case. First stop: Aleppo. A walkabout passed peacefully, except for a few stones thrown at us by a group of children; we gave chase, just to demonstrate our fearlessness – or foolishness. We had been told to avoid the Jewish quarter there and in Damascus, since a visit was likely to endanger the residents as well as us, and since we were not altogether reckless, we obeyed.

The next day we headed toward Damascus with a scheduled stop at the column in the desert atop which St. Simeon Stylites had sat meditating for 40 years. I am always curious about exotic religious practices that encourage disengagement from the world. The site convinced me that Simeon had not taken the easy path in turning away from tikkun olam, from engagement with life and its problems, but his life still seemed to be a cop-out.

On the road to Damascus, we encountered a real-life near-disaster. We were travelling on the only four-lane highway in Syria. I was overtaking an oil tanker, when the tanker driver decided to make a left turn from the right-hand lane, across the median. Slamming on the brakes would have caused us to roll over, and our car couldn't go any faster. The tanker ripped the side off the car, but thankfully left its inhabitants unharmed.

Local practice was that a judge was sent to the site of an accident to determine fault, and one soon appeared. Two years of A's in classical Arabic at university and knowing the Hebrew cognate enabled me to figure out that the word sayara meant vehicle, but I understood nothing else of any relevance. Between us, Ed and I knew English, French, German, Hebrew and Yiddish. We determined that the judge knew no European languages, and we decided not to test his Yiddish or Hebrew.

Relief and salvation came from a different source. Nearby was an Armenian school, and one of the students, who hoped some day to join his brother in the United States, volunteered to translate. It happened to be "be nice to western tourists season." The truck driver was convicted and ordered to pay the costs of repairing the car. We continued by bus to Palmyra – Tadmor in Hebrew – the site of a famous Roman ruin and an infamous prison where Israeli prisoners were held and tortured; Damascus, where we saw the Dura-Europos Synagogue, which had been dismantled and reconstructed in the national museum, and Beirut.

A week later, the car was almost as good as new, and we headed for Jerusalem by way of Baalbek, a stupendous ancient ruin now a seat of Hezbollah terrorists; the cedars of Lebanon; Amman; Petra, the subject of a stirring Israeli song then banned from the airwaves, because some thrill seekers had been killed trying to get there; and the Old City. In Jerusalem, we learned why the western Temple wall is known as the "Wailing Wall." A helpful guide told us that once Jews worshipped there, but now they could only cry in memory of "the good old days." We entered the promised land through the Mandelbaum Gate, although the wary Israeli guards required some convincing that, while we might be foolhardy, we were harmless. We arrived just in time for the first day of classes.

During the months that followed, I gave quite a few lectures about that trip. Israelis could not then visit any of the places we had been and showed keen interest in our pictures and tales of derring-do. We had entered the "forbidden city" and emerged unscathed. No one imagined that little more than half a year later, our eager listeners would have their own, more dramatic tales of Syria, Jordan and Lebanon, to say nothing of Ramallah, Sinai, and the Golan, stories of historical and political significance, of real bravery and loss, of personal and national deliverance.

When not giving travel talks, I learned a lot that year at Hebrew University and at Neve Schechter from several exceptional teachers. Ernst Akiba Simon, an educator who could make classical texts, especially Gemara, speak to the present in a way that I had not encountered before and only seldom since, stands out in my memory. And I had my first taste of professional scholarship, as the research assistant of Moshe Davis, the first American to earn a doctorate at the Hebrew University and the founding father of America-Holy Land Studies and of the university's Institute of Contemporary Jewry. I had been Davis' student in New York, and in later years I would be his colleague, team teaching with him a graduate seminar at Hebrew U.

Fast forward to May 1967. As war clouds gathered, my mother was, to put it delicately, very unhappy at my refusal to return home. Ed and I had planned another trip for the return journey, this time through eastern Europe. We cancelled, knowing that Israeli friends would not understand if we abandoned ship, but also because we wanted to help in any way we could. There were few encouraging signs. An Arab acquaintance at Hebrew U told a friend of mine: "I hope you know how to swim."

War clouds gathered in May, 1967

As the month progressed, the call-up took younger people from their jobs; "unessential" sectors of the economy were coming to a standstill. At a time when children needed to be occupied and kept calm, schools were short of teachers; other public services were barely functioning.

Since I was the one with the most extensive Israeli experience among the foreign students in Neve Schechter – the Israeli students, who included Zvulun Or-Lev, then Blitzstein, had all been called up – I got the job of co-ordinating the volunteers' activities. I received a list of jobs to fill ranging from teacher to garbage truck driver. The one student who said he could drive a heavy truck got garbage detail. In fact, he learned on the job, but garbage trucks can take a lot of punishment. Most of the others were assigned to schools in and around Jerusalem. They also learned on the job and discovered that teachers can take a lot of punishment. I took the last job, in a Beit Shemesh religious high school, since I had a car and could get there.

When the shooting started, regular life came to a halt. None of us North Americans had had any experience of war. But no one panicked. It was probably for the best that parents couldn't get through to any of us. Cellphones were years in the future, and the regular trans-Atlantic phone service was spotty in the best of times. We now got new assignments.

Since I had a car, my task for a couple of days was picking up the bodies of those who had died a natural death. The chevrah kadishah had all it could do to handle casualties from the battle for Jerusalem. I have never forgotten or quite recovered from my visits to the morgue at the old Shaarei Tzedek Hospital: a room piled with the bodies of soldiers, many of them younger than I, still in their uniforms, one or two with family names I recognized from the university.

Another day I was assigned to the nearby Valley of the Cross. At the start of the war, an artillery unit had been stationed there. They had advanced, leaving behind shells, some of them live. Since the valley was a popular children's play space, it was essential to clear away the shells before any kids could hurt themselves. A retired army officer directed us.

We had not been long at work, when an agitated man drove up in a truck to haul away the shells we had collected. "What are we doing?" he shouted. "Just up the hill there, we are holding Arab PoWs on the tennis courts of the Hebrew University. They get food and water and are treated decently. And they? What do they do? I just saw on Syrian television two of our downed flyers being lynched in a main square of Damascus," a place I had visited myself just a few months earlier. "They understand only one language," the man shouted. "We need to treat them as they treat us."

The meaning of a Jewish state

For a minute or two there was silence. Then the officer fixed his eyes on the driver. "We are fighting this war," he said softly, "in order not to be like them. If we act as they do, then we have lost, even if we have won."

For me, that was the defining moment of the war, perhaps of all my experiences in Israel. And it was as good a statement of the meaning of a Jewish state as I could imagine. It explained why, in the weeks before the war, commanders assigned as required reading for soldiers in the trenches S. Yizhar's cautionary story from the War of Independence, The Captive, about the inevitably brutalizing effects of war on all participants, the good guys as well as the bad guys. And it put into context the ruins of Antioch, Baalbek and Palmyra and the diminished congregations of Europe that we had visited some months earlier. More than anything, it put into context the bodies at Shaarei Tzedek, including that of a fellow student from Neve Schechter, Moshe Abitbol, a lively, gentle, extraordinarily friendly Israeli, whose family in Be'er Sheva were so proud of their first university student.

If this were fiction, the story would end here. But it is not fiction, and sadly, the story does not end here. Israel won a stunning victory in 1967, but it turned out not to be the war to end wars. And the vision of that officer in the Valley of the Cross, whose name I never learned, continues to be sorely tested.

At this time of renewal, the beginning of a new year, we hope and pray, not only for the continuing fulfilment of that exalted ideal but also for its fulfilment in a time of peace and security for Israel, her neighbours and all the world.

Israel did not want this war

By David J. Bercuson

On Reflection

At 7:45 am, Monday, June, 5, 1967, Egyptian air-force fighter pilots were in their mess halls at airbases near El Arish in the northern Sinai, at Ismailia, in the Suez Canal Zone, and around Cairo.

They were eating breakfast as their sleek Soviet-built jets sat parked in the morning sunshine along runways and in concrete revetments. Another day of routine air patrol in the skies over the Sinai Peninsula was about to begin. But as the Egyptian pilots ate, an on-rushing tide of Israeli fighter jets swept toward them from over the Mediterranean. Just before 8:00 a.m., the Israelis struck.

First, they blasted huge holes in the concrete runways using specially designed bombs. Then they quickly reduced the Egyptian planes to rubble. They also blew up fuel depots, destroyed hangars and gutted Egyptian anti-aircraft defences. That first air attack was followed within the hour by two other air assaults that struck at Syria and Jordan. By mid-morning, the Arab air forces had ceased to exist.

The Israeli attack was a pre-emptive strike aimed at destroying Arab air power and gaining air superiority for the ground war that was about to begin. In that war, Israeli armoured forces quickly captured the Gaza Strip from Egypt, then drove the Egyptian army across the Suez Canal and out of the Sinai.

When Jordan's King Hussein chose – against Israeli pleas – to join the battle, with his army beginning to shell western Jerusalem and central Israel, Israel pushed the Jordanians out of the West Bank and Jerusalem and across the Jordan River. When Syria decided to continue the fighting by shelling northern Israel even after the Egyptian and Jordanian defeat, the Israelis scaled the Golan Heights, captured them and drove the Syrian army toward Damascus. It was all over in six short days.

Although Israel initiated the Six Day War with its air attacks on June 5, 1967, the war was a war Israel did not want, and did its best to avoid. The immediate cause of the crisis was increasing tension between Syria and Israel, culminating in a large air battle on April 7, 1967.

For several years before that air battle, Syria had intensified its efforts to kill Israelis and disrupt life in northern Israel. Syria gave free rein to Palestinian terrorists to slip over their demarcation line with Israel – a line that ran across the foot of the Golan Heights – to attack Israeli villages and farming communities. They tried to disrupt with heavy shellfire the construction of the National Water Carrier, a major water pipeline inside Israel that carried fresh water from the Sea of Galilee to the Negev Desert in the south. The Syrians set the farms of northern Israel ablaze from artillery positions on the Golan Heights; their artillery spotters on the heights were close enough to the Israeli farms to see the children playing and the laundry hanging on the lines.

On April 7, Israeli jets rose to retaliate against the latest round of Syrian shelling; the Syrians sent their jets to meet them. The Israelis shot six Syrian fighters out of the sky, then peeled off to break the sound barrier over Damascus. The enraged Syrians responded by giving Palestinian terrorists the green light to intensify attacks on Israel; an unprecedented 14 attacks were carried out from April 7 to May 11.

Israeli Prime Minister Levi Eshkol, seen by many Israelis as a hesitant and indecisive leader, went on Israeli radio twice in mid-May to warn Syria about possible Israeli retaliation, but he sounded weak and fearful. Eshkol's broadcast may well have been taken as a sign by the Arabs and their Soviet backers that Israel's government was losing its nerve. On the very day of Eshkol's second broadcast, the Soviet Union announced that its satellites had detected a massive buildup of Israeli forces along the northern border with Syria. It was a lie, but it brought the Middle East closer to war.

The Israel-Egypt border had been patrolled by UN forces since the end of the 1956 Sinai/Suez war. Now, with Syria being goaded by the Soviet Union, Syria and other Arab nations demanded to know how long Egyptian president Gamal Abdul Nasser was going to hide behind the United Nation's skirts. Or would he expel the United Nations and send his military to the border with Israel to help the Syrians in the event of an Israeli attack in the north?

On May 16, Nasser gave his answer. He ordered the United Nations to remove its peacekeeping force (which included a large Canadian contingent). The United Nations quickly complied. Nasser then sent more than 100,000 soldiers, with thousands of tanks and artillery pieces right up to the Israeli borders, closed the Strait of Tiran to Israeli shipping and began to threaten a war of annihilation against Israel.

On May 30, Jordan's King Hussein flew to Cairo to sign a military alliance with Egypt and Syria. Hussein was reluctant to join a war against Israel, but he was simply unable to resist the pressure both from within Jordan and from Syria, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries. Israel was now isolated, facing a three-front war.

By the end of May 1967, the first serious threat to Israel's existence since Israel's War of Independence (1947-49) had materialized almost from out of nowhere. The combined ground and air forces of Egypt, Syria and Jordan dwarfed the Israeli military. In 1967, Israel was a mere 10 kilometres wide at its narrowest point along the sea opposite Tulkarm and Qalqilya. From the heights near those towns, Jordanian gunners could watch the surf pounding along the Mediterranean shore and monitor traffic along the main highway from Tel Aviv to Haifa. In the northern Gaza strip, Egyptian armour was parked less than 40 kilometres from the southwestern suburbs of Tel Aviv. Egyptian fighters and bombers sat on airstrips five minutes by air from Israel's major cities. The most forward Syrian positions were a 20-minute drive from Haifa.

Faced with terrible choices

Israel's friends in the world – she had precious few even then – cautioned Israel against taking "hasty" action. They debated endlessly in the UN Security Council over what to do while the Arabs stood to their guns and put the last finishing touches on their attack plans. The Israelis were faced with terrible choices: to sit and wait behind indefensible borders for the first massive blow; to trust that the Arabs were bluffing and would not attack; to accept the new military status quo wherein heavily armed Arab troops stood literally on Israel's borders and Israel's sea lines of communication to Africa and Asia via Eilat were permanently cut; to beg the international community to come to its aid; to fight for its life.

On May 16, Israel began to mobilize and the nation in arms came alive. Truck drivers and bus drivers, accountants and farmers, lawyers and mechanics, disappeared from their places of work to don uniforms and show up at airbases, tank parks, and army garrisons around Israel's borders. By May 30, the mobilization was complete; the Israel Defence Forces had quadrupled in size in a mere two weeks. It was ready for war.

When the first Arab-Israeli war had ended in early January 1949, Israel had been left with indefensible borders. Pre-1967 Israel had no defence-in-depth, and no room to manoeuvre in the event of an attack. It simply could not wait for an enemy attack because if it did, it would be fighting to defend Israel within the very small area of the nation itself – in the Sharon valley, in the Galilee, in the Negev, in the very streets of western Jerusalem and the rolling plains around Ben-Gurion Airport. That left one option; any war would have to be fought outside Israel's boundaries and in most conceivable circumstances, this dictated striking first.

The Israelis won because they were very highly motivated

There was another factor that left Israel with little choice but to attack. Vastly outnumbered by its Arab enemies, Israel had developed a mobilization system heavily dependent on its reserves. The Israel military, then and now, consists of a professional full-time core augmented by conscripts who do three years of service (two for females) and by reservists. Reservists are soldiers who have completed their conscript service but who are obliged to return to their bases for a month or so of refresher training and service each year until they are in their early 50s. They normally make up at least two-thirds of Israel's deployable military, but they are also the core of the nation's workforce. Israel cannot stay at a highly mobilized state for long without crippling its economy and society. Thus on June 5, 1967, Israel attacked and won a major victory that changed the balance of power in the Middle East and left Israel in possession of the Golan Heights, the West Bank, all of Jerusalem and the Sinai Peninsula.

Why was Israel able to score that major victory? Israel did not win the Six Day War because of superior weapons. With the exception of a few squadrons of deltawing, French-built Mirage fighters that were brand-new and completely up-to-date, everything else the Israelis flew, drove or fired were hand-me-downs. Some of their main equipment even included updated weapons from World War II. The Egyptians and the Syrians, by contrast, had the latest Soviet-built aircraft, armour and artillery.

The Israelis won because they were far better trained, more daring, more innovative in battle and – most important – very highly motivated. They were fighting to protect their homes and literally to prevent a second Holocaust. In World War II, the Jews of Europe had been hapless and mostly friendless victims of Nazi murder, but in 1967 the Jews of Israel were well armed and determined to thwart the murderous plans of their would-be killers. The Arab armies had better equipment but were poorly trained and led and lacked motivation. Sometimes they stood and fought well. The Jordanian army was especially effective in defending positions near Mount Scopus and took a heavy toll of Israeli lives. But for the most part the Syrian and Egyptian troops broke quickly when they were in danger of being outflanked. Especially in the Sinai, Egyptian soldiers were killed from the air in large numbers or died of thirst or starvation in the vast reaches of the Sinai.

The Israeli victory in 1967 changed the political geography of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The State of Israel more than doubled in size; the new ceasefire lines seemed far more defensible than its 1949 borders. But the victory also brought troubles. The IDF concluded that since Israel could now defend-in-depth far from its population centres, it need no longer resort to pre-emptive strikes. Israel paid dearly for that state of mind in the opening days of the Yom Kippur War in October 1973.

In addition, more than a million Palestinian Arabs lived in Gaza, the West Bank, occupied Syria and east Jerusalem. The Palestinian population of the newly occupied territories included both those who had lived there since before Israel won its independence and those refugees who had been living in semi-permanent refugee camps since 1949. Thus was the basis laid for the occupation that Israel has shouldered from then until now.

Jewish state still struggles for its security

When the war ended, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 242, which called for an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict and the establishment of secure and recognized boundaries for all countries in the region in return for an Israeli withdrawal "from territories" occupied in the war. Israel accepted Resolution 242 and declared that it was prepared to implement it in full. However, the Arab answer was given at Khartoum, Sudan, in the fall of 1967 – there would be no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with Israel and no peace with Israel. Partly in response to the Khartoum Conference and partly for reasons of domestic politics, Israel began to establish settlements in the occupied territories.

The struggle for Israeli security continued with the 1973 October/Ramadan/Yom Kippur war, the ongoing war between Israel and the Palestinians, two full-blown Israeli wars in Lebanon, two Palestinian intifadahs or uprisings, and a Palestinian terror campaign utilizing suicide bombings that was launched against Israel in the early 1990s. The second Lebanon war of July and August 2006 was only the latest of these ongoing campaigns.

The Middle East is a very complicated place. Israel has not always followed the wisest policies. No state has a perfect record in diplomacy, human rights or fighting wars while limiting damage to non-combatants. Thus it is sometimes forgotten, even by Israel's friends, that all of these wars still have the same single cause: Israel's enemies will not accept a non-Muslim state in the middle of the Arab world and everything else is window dressing. Unless that changes one day, Israel's struggle for basic security will continue.

Six Day War vet has mixed feelings about `67 conflict

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Nearly four decades on, Meir Dahan, a 61-year-old veteran of the Six Day War, still has mixed feelings about the conflict.

"Happiness filled with sadness," Dahan said, succinctly summing it up.

Dahan, who fought on three fronts as a paratrooper, is glad that he was a participant in Israel's greatest military victory.

Personal Testimony

Yet the memory of comrades who never returned from the battlefield remains a source of enduring pain.

"I was very happy with the result of the war," he explained, "but I'm sad about all those guys we lost."

A stocky man of medium height who exudes strength and gentleness, Dahan and his first wife lived in the port of Ashdod in the summer of 1967.

A sergeant in the reserves, he was mobilized during the intense political crisis that preceded the outbreak of the war.

Dahan's oldest brother, Avi, who lives in Phoenix, Ariz., today, was called up by the navy. His second oldest brother, Jacob, now a resident of Toronto, served in an artillery battery.

Dahan was never in doubt that Egypt's brinkmanship, and the war hysteria boiling up in the rest of the Arab world, would trigger a conflict.

"We knew that war was inevitable. What we didn't know was when it would start," said Dahan, who counted down the days to the war in a camp adjacent to the Gaza Strip.

A building contractor in civilian life, he was sure that Israel would emerge victorious.

"I knew we would win. I had confidence in my unit and in my friends."

And he was buoyed by photographs he had seen of retreating Egyptian troops during the 1956 Sinai Campaign. So he was certain that the outcome of the war would be in Israel's favour.

Yet Dahan was neither cocky nor arrogant. He remembers thinking that he might be killed or return as an invalid.

When shooting broke out on June 5, 1967, Dahan found himself in a jeep racing into Gaza, which had been occupied by Egypt since the 1948 War of Independence and had been a base for Palestinian fedayeen.

Meir Dahan in 1967, on the eve of the Six Day War

"An air strike cleared the way for us," he said.

Dahan's force captured Khan Yunis and Rafah before reaching El Arish, the biggest town in the Sinai Peninsula.

It was his first time under fire. The closest he had previously come to combat was when he took part in an intelligence-gathering mission in the Sinai in 1964.

Fighting was difficult and hazardous

Having accomplished its goals in a couple of days, Dahan's unit was dispatched to the Arab sector of Jerusalem, where fierce battles had already broken out after Jordanian shelling.

The house-to-house fighting was difficult and hazardous. "They shot at me," he said, referring to the Arab Legion, "and I shot back."

The price of capturing old Jerusalem was high. More than two-thirds of his fellow soldiers were killed.

He had a brush with death when a grenade blew up far enough away to not have seriously injured him, but close enough to have bloodied him.

"Luckily, I didn't even need medical attention."

'I thought our problems with the Arabs were over'

As the war wound down, Dahan was transferred to the Golan Heights, which Syria had militarized. "We chased the Syrians. They ran away."

But even here, on a front that had been virtually pacified, Israel had to contend with casualties.

As an Israeli soldier in Dahan's unit offered water to a thirsty Syrian, he was killed when the prisoner of war suddenly whipped out a gun and shot him.

Several days after the war ended, Dahan was demobilized and sent back home.

"I thought our problems with the Arabs were over," he said. "We had peace and quiet for a while, but it didn't last."

Shortly after the war, the Palestinians launched the first of a multitude of terrorist attacks; Egypt fired on Israeli soldiers hunkered down along the Suez Canal; and the Palestine Liberation Organization, headed by Yasser Arafat, created a new front in Jordan.

In the years following the Six Day War, Dahan – a Sephardi Jew of Moroccan origin who was raised in Jerusalem and whose parents immigrated to Israel in 1948 performed his annual reserve duty near Jericho.

During the 1973 Yom Kippur War, he fought in the Sinai, where two of his friends were taken captive and subsequently murdered by the Egyptians.

Dahan immigrated to Canada in 1980, but his two sisters, Shoshana and Chana, as well as his 38-year-old daughter, Advah (Debby), live in Israel.

His parents, Michael (Mahlouf) and Rachel, are deceased.

In 1986, he married his second wife, Marilyn, a native of Montreal. The Dahans have a son, Jordan, and five other children from previous marriages.

As he looks back at the Six Day War, which now seems distant to him, Dahan, who is right-of-centre politically, has only one regret.

"I wish we had never kept Gaza. We didn't need it. It was like a cancer."

Dahan, who has been back to Israel on regular visits since his departure, doubts whether Israel will taste the fruits of peace in his lifetime.

As he glumly put it, "Israel will have to fight for its existence."

Volunteers recall sense of need to help

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Personal Testimony

At the time, Rikee Madoff was Rikee Gutherz, an 18-year-old who had just finished her first year at Sir George Williams University, as Concordia University in Montreal was then known. Dr. Frank Guttman, only 36, had just completed training as a resident at the Jewish General Hospital.

In June 1967, during the Six Day War, each of them, although they had different backgrounds and upbringing, found themselves in Israel.

They were drawn there by an overriding urge to do something to help, after Egypt and other neighbouring nations had provoked Israel into a war in which the world would come to see the Jewish state – all too briefly, perhaps – as the David instead of the Goliath.

In six short days, less than a week, and barely enough time for nations engaged in war to even exchange first volleys, Israel had emerged not only victorious and relatively unscathed – it did suffer a bitter loss of some 700 Israeli soldiers – but once again in control of Judaism's most cherished site, the Western Wall in Jerusalem. The Jewish world exulted in relief and jubilation at the unqualified, euphoric victory.

'I felt so connected to the land'

But only one week earlier, this was not the case, as Israel and the Diaspora, in dread that the Jewish state faced imminent and complete catastrophe, called for support. The response was unprecedented.

The most vivid recollection of the Six Day War period in Rikee Gutherz-Madoff's mind was of blades of grass. Sitting alone in a kibbutz field near the Lebanese border, Gutherz was planting blades of grass, one at a time, methodically, with love and care.

"I felt I was doing the most important thing on the world," she remembered about that late spring of 1967.

"I felt so connected to the land, it was unbelievable," she said in an interview. "I was the happiest person in the world."

Gutherz, before leaving for her first trip to Israel, would never have predicted that response within herself, one so close to her very being.

She had departed for Israel through Europe out of a sense that "my country needed me," but her ardency and passion for the Jewish state did not emerge until she was actually there.

Gutherz was the product of an upbringing in which Israel, Zionism and Jewishness were a part of her family's life, but not in any dominating sense. Growing up with her older siblings, brother Phil and sister Faige, five decades ago, mostly around the area of the Young Israel Synagogue, at one time the heart of the Jewish community during its decades-long westward migration in Montreal, Gutherz attended public school and, after classes, the Yiddish, ideologically secular Avrum Reisen afternoon school.

1967 made clear the meaning of Israel

Gutherz's parents, Sonia and Joseph, had managed to evade the Holocaust and had come to Canada from Poland. Dozens of other family members from both sides were consumed in the ovens.

That fact, now, is an ever-present element and legacy in Gutherz's life and has made a permanent imprint on her sensibility. But during her childhood, she recalled, as far as Israel and Jewishness were concerned, they were not part of her life in any fervent sense.

"Growing up in my parents' home," she said, "we had many, many tchachkes from Israel: matchboxes, lighters, metal plates with Hebrew letters, painting of Safed. They were sent to us or brought back by people who visited Israel.

"I remember my father used to read the Forward, the Yiddish paper, and my mother singing in her choir about "the promised land."

Gutherz also had cousins living in an Israeli moshav, Kfar Hess, between Netanya and Tel Aviv.

So Jewishness and Israel were a definite part of her life. But only in June of '67 did it become clear to Gutherz, almost viscerally, just how much.

Israeli soldiers were singing in the streets

"I don't know exactly what it was," she recalled. "I just felt my country needed me. I had to go help my country. I felt drawn to do whatever I could."

Gutherz ended up travelling to Israel – as things turned out, within a day or two of the war's completion with an organized Habonim group that filled a bus. She recalled being excited on the plane, not anxious or filled with trepidation. "I had absolutely no fear."

Gutherz and half her group were brought to a 90-member kibbutz called Malkiyah just a stone's throw from the Lebanese border, where Canadian volunteers were assigned duties left behind by those who were out doing the fighting at the front.

"I knew very little Hebrew," she recalled.

The soldiers returned to the kibbutz about a month later. Gutherz stayed in the kibbutz during that month, picking peaches, remembering vividly how the "fuzz" irritated the skin. Gutherz also cleaned chickens, worked in the laundry room, helped irrigate sapling trees and planted those blades of grass, an act that nourished and nurtured her soul as almost no other had up to that time.

She also travelled to Jerusalem, where she saw Israel Defence Forces soldiers "singing in the streets" in elation over Israel's victory. "The most beautiful thing I ever experienced," she said. "It was a very special time to be there."

While at the kibbutz, Gutherz and others in her group were also brought to the Kuneitra border area of Syria, where she saw first-hand the true impact of war. "The first thing you smelled was the stench of death," she said. "You never forget it."

One of her most memorable recollections was visiting her now-deceased uncle Chaim Gutherz (his Israeli family name became Lev-Tov) at Kfar Hess moshav, where cousins of hers still live today.

Dr. Frank Guttman, pictured circa 1967, ministered to the injured at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem during the Six Day War.

'I knew I had to go to Israel'

But overall, the impact of her first trip to Israel during that fateful June of 1967 was great indeed.

"I used to see pictures of Israel and imagine what it would be like," Gutherz said. "This trip was a major catharsis in my life. I had discovered my land."

Gutherz returned in 1972, but then again not until 1999.

In 1967, "people kept asking me to stay. I was tempted, but was too insecure."

For Dr. Frank Guttman, going to Israel within a day or two after the outbreak of hostilities on June 5, 1967, was, in a sense, a decision he never had to make, since he would never have had it any other way.

Already practising both as a pediatrician and as a general surgeon at the Jewish General and St. Justine's hospitals, Guttman, a committed Zionist from his youth, never considered not volunteering.

"I knew I had to go. [Egyptian president Gamal Abdel] Nasser had been threatening Israel since May. I told my wife [Herta, also a physician] that as a surgeon, I had to go. I knew Israel and had worked there before."

That decision by Guttman, now 75, was very much in keeping with the values that had been instilled in him since his childhood, he related in an interview.

'We strongly identified as Jews'

Guttman grew up with his siblings in Outremont's "Jewish village," part of a very Zionistic family (his father, Joseph, was founder of Progress Band Clothes, an institution in the garment industry for generations).

As early as 1949, at age 18, Guttman had already visited the fledgling Jewish state with a Zionist youth group and spent a whole year on two kibbutzim. Over a lifetime now, he's probably been to Israel close to two dozen times.

"We strongly identified as Jews growing up," he recalled. Although he attended non-Jewish schools during the day, Guttman attended Adath Israel synagogue every Shabbat and its afternoon school, but as a teen he became disenchanted with the religious aspect of Judaism. "I could not conceive of a God who would permit such evil as the Shoah."

Because of the quota system at McGill University, which was still in force during the 1950s, Guttman studied medicine at the University of Geneva, where he met his wife, who eventually became head of the Allan Memorial Institute Department of Psychiatry of Royal Victoria Hospital.

Guttman began to train at the Jewish General Hospital and then went to the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem in 1961-62 for his residency training. Eventually, Guttman would become the first Jewish full professor in the general surgery department at McGill University's medical school.

On June 6, 1967, Guttman, after notifying the Israeli Consulate of his intention to treat the injured in Israel, boarded the first flight out of Montreal and arrived at Lod Airport via Belgium.

"I had some anxiety, I suppose," Guttman recalled. "At that point, we didn't really know the extent of the war."

Ceasefire lines after the Six Day War
[Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs]

Treated a ward of wounded Jordanian soldiers

Two tattered and yellowed newspaper clippings about Guttman from that time, which appeared in the Gazette and the now-defunct Montreal Star, portray his undertaking as almost heroic, and Israel as fighting for its existence.

As the newspapers wrote – and as Guttman told The CJN he spent only about three weeks in Israel in all, at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, replacing the younger doctors who were called away to serve on the war front. Guttman himself was among almost 150 doctors from all over the world who came to Israel during that period to help out.

Guttman was put in charge of a ward of Jordanian soldiers who had been wounded and captured. The Star reported that Guttman's "confidence in Israeli doctors was amply justified" at Hadassah Hospital.

"In Dr. Guttman's view," the newspaper said, "the Israeli members of the medical profession had risen to the call of national duty as rapidly as the Israeli armed forces had."

WALKING AROUND THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM

These marchers for peace in Jerusalem bring to life the prophet's words "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem. May all who love you prosper. May peace be within your walls and prosperity within your palaces."

'Israel has a lot to be proud of'

The story in the Gazette tells of an incident in which Guttman tried to convince one of the Jordanians that he needed one of his legs amputated. The distrusting Jordanian refused, then accepted when an Arab-Israeli physician intervened, only to refuse again just as he was about to go under the knife.

Guttman also spent time during his trip visiting the Western Wall and recalled, admittedly naively in retrospect, that he considered the results of the war a "wonderful opportunity to make peace" with Israel's Arab neighbours and the Palestinians.

In the view of Guttman, however, who was later to become the national co-president of Canadian Friends of Peace Now for 23 years (until 2002, when he was succeeded by Stephen Scheinberg), Israel's "hubris" after it obtained control over what became known as the "occupied territories" affected its judgment.

"It lessened their ability to see a solution," Guttman said.

Guttman said he viewed the upcoming 40th anniversary of the Six Day War "with mixed feelings."

Regrettably, he said, the anniversary, while a testament to the courage shown by Israeli soldiers and to the prowess of the Jewish state in winning a decisive and deserved victory, it is also a "sad reminder" of what could have been but has not yet happened.

"Israel has a lot to be proud of," Guttman said, "as a viable and democratic state, but there are also deficiencies."

Our basic objective will be to destroy Israel

Excerpts from a speech by Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser to Arab trade unionists on May 26, 1967.

On the Record

You, the Arab workers' federations, represent the biggest force in the Arab world. We can achieve much by Arab action, which is a main part of our battle.

We must develop and build our countries to face the challenge of our enemies. The Arab world now is very different from what it was 10 days ago. Israel is also different from what it was 10 days ago. Despair has never found its way into Arab hearts and never will. The Arabs insist on their rights and are determined to regain the rights of the Palestinian people. The Arabs must accomplish this set intention and this aim. The first elements of this aim appeared in the test of Syria and Egypt in facing the Israeli threat. I believe that this test was a major starting point and basis from which to achieve complete cohesion in the Arab world. What we see today in the masses of the Arab people everywhere is their desire to fight. The Arab people want to regain the rights of the people of Palestine.

Gamal Abdel Nasser

For several years, many people have raised doubts about our intentions toward Palestine. But talk is easy and action is difficult, very difficult. We emerged wounded from the 1956 battle. Britain, Israel and France attacked us then. We sustained heavy losses in 1956. Later, union was achieved. The 1961 secession occurred when we had only just got completely together and had barely begun to stand firmly on our feet.

Later, the Yemeni revolution broke out. We considered it our duty to rescue our brothers, simply because of the principles and ideals which we advocated and still advocate.

We were waiting for the day when we would be fully prepared and confident of being able to adopt strong measures if we were to enter the battle with Israel. I say nothing aimlessly. One day two years ago, I stood up to say that we had no plan to liberate Palestine and that revolutionary action was our only course to liberate Palestine. I spoke at the summit conferences. The summit conferences were meant to prepare the Arab states to defend themselves.

Recently, we felt we are strong enough that if we were to enter a battle with Israel, with God's help, we could triumph. On this basis, we decided to take actual steps.

A great deal has been said in the past about the UN Emergency Force [UNEF, in the Sinai Peninsula]. Many people blamed us for UNEF's presence. We were not strong enough. Should we have listened to them, or rather built and trained our army while UNEF still existed? I said once that we could tell UNEF to leave within half an hour. Once we were fully prepared we could ask UNEF to leave. And this is what actually happened.

The same thing happened with regard to Sharm el-Sheikh. We were attacked on this score by some Arabs. Taking Sharm el-Sheikh [and blockading Israeli shipping by closing the Straits of Tiran] meant confrontation with Israel. Taking such action also meant that we were ready to enter a general war with Israel. It was not a separate operation. Therefore, we had to take this fact into consideration when moving to Sharm el-Sheikh. The present operation was mounted on this basis.

Actually I was authorized by the [Arab Socialist Union's] Supreme Executive Committee to implement this plan at the right time. The right time came when Syria was threatened with aggression. We sent reconnaissance aircraft over Israel. Not a single brigade was stationed opposite us on the Israeli side of the border. All Israeli brigades were confronting Syria. All but four brigades have now moved south to confront Egypt. Those four are still on the border with Syria. We are confident that once we have entered the battle we will triumph, God willing.

With regard to military plans, there is complete co-ordination of military action between us and Syria. We will operate as one army fighting a single battle for the sake of a common objective – the objective of the Arab nation.

The problem today is not just Israel, but also those behind it. If Israel embarks on an aggression against Syria or Egypt, the battle against Israel will be a general one and not confined to one spot on the Syrian or Egyptian borders. The battle will be a general one and our basic objective will be to destroy Israel. I probably could not have said such things five or even three years ago. If I had said such things and had been unable to carry them out my words would have been empty and worthless.

Why all this uproar because of the closure of the Gulf of Aqaba?

Today, some eleven years after 1956, I say such things because I am confident. I know what we have here in Egypt and what Syria has. I also know that other states, Iraq, for instance, has sent its troops to Syria; Algeria will send troops; Kuwait also will send troops. They will send armoured and infantry units. This is Arab power. This is the true resurrection of the Arab nation, which at one time was probably in despair.

Today people must know the reality of the Arab world. What is Israel? Israel today is the United States. The United States is the chief defender of Israel. As for Britain, I consider it America's lackey. Britain does not have an independent policy. Wilson always follows Johnson's steps and says what he wants him to say. All Western countries take Israel's view.

The Gulf of Aqaba was a closed waterway prior to 1956. We used to search British, U.S., French and all other ships. After the tripartite aggression – and we all know the tripartite plot—we left the area to UNEF, which came here under a UN resolution to make possible the withdrawal of Britain, France and Israel. The Israelis say they opened the maritime route. I say they told lies and believed their own lies. We withdrew because the British and the French attacked us. This battle was never between us and Israel alone.

I have recently been with the armed forces. All the armed forces are ready for a battle face to face between the Arabs and Israel. Those behind Israel are also welcome.

We must know and learn a big lesson today. We must actually see that, in its hypocrisy and in its talks with the Arabs, the United States sides with Israel 100 per cent and is partial in favour of Israel. Why is Britain biased toward Israel? The West is on Israel's side. General de Gaulle's personality caused him to remain impartial on this question and not to toe the U.S. or the British line. France,, therefore, did not take sides with Israel.

The Soviet Union's attitude was great and splendid. It supported the Arabs and the Arab nation. It went to the extent of stating that, together with the Arabs and the Arab nation, it would resist any interference or aggression.

Today every Arab knows foes and friends. If we do not learn who our enemies and our friends are, Israel will always be able to benefit from this behaviour. It is clear that the United States is an enemy of the Arabs because it is completely biased in favour of Israel. It is also clear that Britain is an enemy of the Arabs because she, too, is completely biased in favour of Israel. On this basis we must treat our enemies and those who side with our enemies as actual enemies. We can accord them such treatment. In fact, we are not states without status. We are states of status occupying an important place in the world. Our states have thousands of years of civilization behind them – 7,000 years of civilization. Indeed, we can do much; we can expose the hypocrisy the hypocrisy of our enemies if they try to persuade us that they wish to serve our interest. The United States seeks to serve only Israel's interests. Britain also seeks to serve only Israel's interests.

The question is not one of international law. Why all this uproar because of the closure of the Gulf of Aqaba? When [then-Israeli prime minister Levi] Eshkol and [then-Israeli chief of staff Yitzhak] Rabin threatened Syria, nobody spoke about peace or threats to peace. They actually hate the progressive regime in Syria. The United States, Britain and reaction which is the friend of the United States and Britain - do not favour the national progressive regime in Syria. Israel, of course, shares their feelings. Israel is an ally of the United States and Britain. When Israel threatened Syria, they kept quiet and accepted what it said. But when we exercise one of our legitimate rights, as we always do, they turn the world upside down and speak about threats to peace and about a crisis in the Middle East. They fabricate these matters and threaten us with war.

We shall not relinquish our rights. We shall not concede our right in the Gulf of Aqaba. Today, the people of Egypt, the Syrian army and the Egyptian army comprise one front. We want the entire front surrounding Israel to become one front. We want this. Naturally there are obstacles at present. Of course, [then-Jordanian prime minister] Wasfi al-Tal is a spy for the Americans and the British. We cannot co-operate with these spies in any form, because the battle is one of destiny and the spies have no place in this battle.

We want the front to become one united front around Israel. We will not relinquish the rights of the people of Palestine, as I have said before. I was told at the time that I might have to wait seventy years. During the Crusaders' occupation, the Arabs waited 70 years before a suitable opportunity arose and they drove away the Crusaders. Some people commented that Abdel Nasser said we should shelve the Palestinian question for 70 years, but I say that as a people with an ancient civilization, as an Arab people, we are determined that the Palestine question will not be liquidated or forgotten. The whole question, then, is the proper time to achieve our aims. We are preparing ourselves constantly.

You are the hope of the Arab nation and its vanguard. As workers, you are actually building the Arab nation. The quicker we build, the quicker we will be able to achieve our aim.

We would like to take this opportunity to wish all of our patients, family and friends a year of good health and happiness. And may we see peace in Israel and around the world.

Peril for Israel wherever it looked

The following is the statement made to the United Nations Security Council by Israeli foreign minister Abba Eban on June 6, 1967.

On the Record

I thank you, Mr. President, for giving me this opportunity to address the council. I have just come from Jerusalem to tell the Security Council that Israel, by its independent effort and sacrifice, has passed from serious danger to successful resistance.

Two days ago, Israel's condition caused much concern across the humane and friendly world. Israel had reached a sombre hour. Let me try to evoke the point at which our fortunes stood.

An army, greater than any force ever assembled in history in Sinai, had massed against Israel's southern frontier. Egypt had dismissed the United Nations forces which symbolized the international interest in the maintenance of peace in our region. [Egyptian President Gamal Abdel] Nasser had provocatively brought five infantry divisions and two armoured divisions up to our very gates – 80,000 men and 900 tanks were poised to move.

A special striking force, comprising an armoured division with at least 200 tanks, was concentrated against Eilat at the Negev's southern tip. Here was a clear design to cut the southern Negev off from the main body of our state. For Egypt had openly proclaimed that Eilat did not form part of Israel and had predicted that Israel itself would soon expire. The proclamation was empty; the prediction now lies in ruin. While the main brunt of the hostile threat was focused on the southern front, an alarming plan of encirclement was underway. With Egypt's initiative and guidance, Israel was already being strangled in its maritime approaches to the whole eastern half of the world. For 16 years, Israel had been illicitly denied passage in the Suez Canal, despite the Security Council's decision of Sept. 1, 1951 [Resolution 95 (1951)]. And now the creative enterprise of 10 patient years, which had opened an international route across the Strait of Tiran and the Gulf of Aqaba, had been suddenly and arbitrarily choked. Israel was and is breathing only with a single lung.

Jordan had been intimidated, against its better interest, into joining a defence pact. It is not a defence pact at all: it is an aggressive pact, of which I saw the consequences with my own eyes yesterday in the shells falling upon institutions of health and culture in the City of Jerusalem. Every house and street in Jerusalem now came into the range of fire as a result of Jordan's adherence to this pact; so also did the crowded and pathetically narrow coastal strip in which so much of Israel's life and population is concentrated.

Abba Eban addresses the Security Council

Iraqi troops reinforced Jordanian units in areas immediately facing vital and vulnerable Israel communication centres. Expeditionary forces from Algeria and Kuwait had reached Egyptian territory. Nearly all the Egyptian forces that had been attempting the conquest of Yemen had been transferred to the coming assault upon Israel. Syrian units, including artillery, overlooked the Israeli villages in the Jordan Valley. Terrorist troops came regularly into our territory to kill, plunder and set off explosions. The most recent occasion was five days ago.

In short, there was peril for Israel wherever it looked. Its manpower had been hastily mobilized. Its economy and commerce were beating with feeble pulses. Its streets were dark and empty. There was an apocalyptic air of approaching peril. And Israel faced this danger alone.

We were buoyed up by an unforgettable surge of public sympathy across the world. The friendly governments expressed the rather ominous hope that Israel would manage to live, but the dominant theme of our condition was danger and solitude.

Now there could be no doubt about what was intended for us. With my very ears, I heard President Nasser's speech on May 26.

He said: "We intend to open a general assault against Israel. This will be total war. Our basic aim will be to destroy Israel."

On June 2, the Egyptian commander in Sinai, Gen. Abd Al-Mahsan Mortagi, published his Order of the Day, calling on his troops to wage a war of destruction against Israel. Here, then, was a systematic, overt, proclaimed design at politicide, the murder of a state. The policy, the arms, the men had all been brought together, and the state thus threatened with collective assault was itself the last sanctuary of a people which had seen six million of its sons exterminated by a more powerful dictator two decades before.

The question then widely asked in Israel and across the world was whether we had not already gone beyond the utmost point of danger. Was there any precedent in world history, for example, for a nation passively to suffer the blockade of its only southern port, involving nearly all its vital fuel, when such acts of war, legally and internationally, have always invited resistance? This was a most unusual patience. It existed because we had acceded to the suggestion of some of the maritime states that we give them scope to concert their efforts in order to find an international solution which would ensure the maintenance of free passage in the Gulf of Aqaba for ships of all nations and of all flags.

Egypt was overtly bent on destruction

As we pursued this avenue of international solution, we wished the world to have no doubt about our readiness to exhaust every prospect, however fragile, of a diplomatic solution – and some of the prospects that were suggested were very fragile indeed.

But as time went on, there was no doubt that our margin of general security was becoming smaller and smaller. Thus, on the morning of June 5, when Egyptian forces engaged us by air and land, bombarding the villages of Kissufim, Nahal-Oz and Ein Hashlosha, we knew that our limit of safety had been reached, and perhaps passed. In accordance with its inherent right of self-defence as formulated in Article 51 of the United Nations charter, Israel responded defensively in full strength. Never in the history of nations has armed force been used in a more righteous or compelling cause.

Even when engaged with Egyptian forces, we still hoped to contain the conflict. Egypt was overtly bent on our destruction, but we still hoped that others would not join the aggression. Prime Minister [Levi] Eshkol, who for weeks had carried the heavy burden of calculation and decision, published and conveyed a message to other neighbouring states proclaiming: "We shall not attack any country unless it opens war on us. Even now, when the mortars speak, we have not given up our quest for peace. We strive to repel all menace of terrorism and any danger of aggression to ensure our security and our legitimate rights."

In accordance with this same policy of attempting to contain the conflict, yesterday I invited Gen. [Odd] Bull, the chief of staff of the Truce Supervision Organization, to inform the heads of the Jordanian state that Israel had no desire to expand the conflict beyond the unfortunate dimensions that it had already assumed and that if Israel were not attacked on the Jordan side, it would not attack and would act only in self-defence. It reached my ears that this message had been duly and faithfully conveyed and received. Nevertheless, Jordan decided to join the Egyptian posture against Israel and opened artillery attacks across the whole long frontier, including Jerusalem. Those attacks are still in progress.

To the appeal of Prime Minister Eshkol to avoid any further extension of the conflict, Syria answered at 12:25 yesterday morning by bombing Megiddo from the air and bombing Degania at 12:40 with artillery fire, and kibbutz Ein Hammifrats and Kurdani with long-range guns. But Jordan embarked on a much more total assault by artillery and aircraft along the entire front, with special emphasis on Jerusalem, to whose dangerous and noble ordeal yesterday I come to bear personal witness.

King Hussein of Jordan and Egyptian President Nasser sign a defence pact.

There has been bombing of houses; there has been a hit on the great new National Museum of Art; there has been a hit on the university and on Shaare Zedek, the first hospital ever to have been established outside the ancient walls. Is this not an act of vandalism that deserves the condemnation of all mankind? And in the Knesset building, whose construction had been movingly celebrated by the entire democratic world 10 months ago, the Israel cabinet and parliament met under heavy gunfire, whose echoes mingled at the end of our meeting with Hatikvah, the anthem of hope.

Thus throughout the day and night of June 5, Jordan which we had expressly invited to abstain from needless slaughter became, to our surprise, and still remains, the most intense of all the belligerents; and death and injury, as so often in history, stalk Jerusalem's streets.

When the approaching Egyptian aircraft appeared on our radar screens, soon to be followed by artillery attacks on our villages near the Gaza Strip, I instructed Mr. [Gideon] Rafael, [the Israeli representative to the United Nations], to inform the Security Council, in accordance with the provisions of Article 51 of the charter. I know that that involved arousing you, Mr. President, at a most uncongenial hour of the night, but we felt that the Security Council should be most urgently seized.

UNEF rendered distinguished service

I should, however, be less than frank if I were to conceal the fact that the government and people of Israel have been disconcerted by some aspects of the United Nations' role in this conflict. The sudden withdrawal of the United Nations Emergency Force was not accompanied, as it should have been, by due international consultations on the consequences of that withdrawal. Moreover, Israeli interests were affected; they were not adequately explored. No attempt was made, little time given, to help Israel to surmount grave prejudice to its vital interests consequent on that withdrawal. After all, a new confrontation of forces suddenly arose. It suddenly had to be met, and at Sharm al-Sheikh, at the entrance to the Gulf of Aqaba, the Strait of Tiran, legality walked out and blockade walked in. The peace of the world trembled. And thus the United Nations had somehow been put into a position of leaving Sinai safe for belligerency.

It is not, I think, a question of sovereignty that is here involved. The United Nations has a right to ask that, when it assumes a function, the termination of that function shall not take place in conditions that would lead to anti-charter situations. I do not raise this point in order to linger upon that which is past, but because of Israel's general attitude to the peacekeeping functions of this organization. And I confess that my own attitude and those of my colleagues and of my fellow citizens to the peacekeeping functions of the United Nations have been traumatically affected by this experience.

The United Nations Emergency Force rendered distinguished service. Nothing became it less than the manner of its departure. All gratitude and appreciation are owed to the individuals who sustained its action. And if in the course of the recent combats, United Nations personnel have fallen dead or wounded – as they have – then I join my voice in an expression of the most sincere regret.

The problem of the future role of a United Nations presence in conflicts such as these is being much debated. But we must ask ourselves a question that has arisen as a result of this experience. People in our country and in many countries ask: what is the use of a United Nations presence if it is in effect an umbrella which is taken away as soon as it begins to rain? Surely, then, future arrangements for peacekeeping must depend more on the agreement and the implementation of the parties themselves than on machinery which is totally at the mercy of the host country, so totally at its mercy as to be the instrument of its policies, whatever those policies may be.

We have lived through three dramatic weeks

We have lived through three dramatic weeks. Those weeks, I think, have brought into clear view the main elements of tension and also the chief promise of relaxed tension in the future.

The first link in the chain was the series of sabotage acts emanating from Syria. In October of 1966, the Security Council was already seized of this problem, and a majority of its member states found it possible and necessary to draw attention to the Syrian government's responsibility for altering that situation. Scarcely a day passed without a mine, a bomb, a hand grenade or a mortar exploding on Israel's soil, sometimes with lethal or crippling effects, always with an unsettling psychological influence. In general, 14 or 15 such incidents would accumulate before a response was considered necessary, and this ceaseless accumulation of terrorist sabotage incidents in the name of what was called "popular war," together with responses which in the long run sometimes became inevitable, were for a long period the main focus of tension in the Middle East.

But then there came a graver source of tension in mid-May, when abnormal troop concentrations were observed in the Sinai Peninsula. For the 10 years of relative stability beginning with March 1957 and ending with May 1967, the Sinai Desert had been free of Egyptian troops. In other words, a natural geographic barrier, a largely uninhabited space, separated the main forces of the two sides. It is true that in terms of sovereignty and law, any state has a right to put its armies in any part of its territory that it chooses. This, however, is not a legal question: it is a political and a security question.

Experience in many parts of the world, not least in our own, demonstrates that massive armies in close proximity to each other, against a background of a doctrine of belligerency and accompanying threats by one army to annihilate the other, constitute an inflammatory situation.

We were puzzled in Israel by the relative lack of preoccupation on the part of friendly governments and international agencies with this intense concentration, which found its reflection in precautionary concentrations on our side. My government proposed, I think at least two weeks ago, the concept of a parallel and reciprocal reduction of forces on both sides of the frontier. We elicited no response, and certainly no action.

To these grave sources of tension – the sabotage and terrorist movement, emanating mostly from Syria, and the heavy troop concentrations accompanied by dire, apocalyptic threats in Sinai – there was added in the third week of May the most electric shock of all, namely the closure of the international waterway consisting of the Strait of Tiran and the Gulf of Aqaba. It is not difficult, I think, to understand why this incident had a more drastic impact than any other. In 1957, the maritime nations, within the framework of the United Nations General Assembly, correctly enunciated the doctrine of free and innocent passage through the strait.

Now, when that doctrine was proclaimed – and incidentally, not challenged by the Egyptian representative at that time – it was little more than an abstract principle for the maritime world. For Israel, it was a great but still unfulfilled prospect; it was not yet a reality. But during the 10 years in which we and the other states of the maritime community have relied upon that doctrine and upon established usage, the principle has become a reality consecrated by hundreds of sailings under dozens of flags and the establishment of a whole complex of commerce and industry and communication. A new dimension has been added to the map of the world's communications, and on that dimension we have constructed Israel's bridge towards the friendly states of Asia and Africa, a network of relationships which is the chief pride of Israel in the second decade of its independence.

Israel waited

All this, then, had grown up as an effective usage under the United Nations flag. Does Mr. Nasser really think that he can come upon the scene in 10 minutes and cancel the established legal usage and interests of 10 years?

There was in this wanton act a quality of malice. For surely the closing of the Strait of Tiran gave no benefit whatever to Egypt except the perverse joy of inflicting injury on others. It was an anarchic act, because it showed a total disregard for the law of nations, the application of which in this specific case had not been challenged for 10 years. And it was, in the literal sense, an act of arrogance, because there are other nations in Asia and East Africa, that trade with the Port of Eilat, as they have every right to do, through the Strait of Tiran and across the Gulf of Aqaba.

Other sovereign states from Japan to Ethiopia, from Thailand to Uganda, from Cambodia to Madagascar, have a sovereign right to decide for themselves whether they wish or do not wish to trade with Israel. These countries are not colonies of Cairo. They can trade with Israel or not trade with Israel as they wish, and President Nasser is not the policeman of other African and Asian states.

Here then was a wanton intervention in the sovereign rights of other states in the eastern half of the world to decide for themselves whether or not they wish to establish trade relations with either or both of the two ports at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba. When we examine, then, the implications of this act, we have no cause to wonder that the international shock was great. There was another reason too for that shock. Blockades have traditionally been regarded, in the pre-charter parlance, as acts of war. To blockade, after all, is to attempt strangulation; and sovereign states are entitled not to have their trade strangled. To understand how the State of Israel felt, one has merely to look around this table and imagine, for example, a foreign power forcibly closing New York or Montreal, Boston or Marseille, Toulon or Copenhagen, Rio or Tokyo or Bombay harbour. How would your governments react? What would you do? How long would you wait?

But Israel waited because of its confidence that the other maritime powers and countries interested in this new trading pattern would concert their influence in order to re-establish a legal situation and to liquidate this blockade. We concerted action with them, not because Israel's national interest was here abdicated. There will not be, there cannot be, an Israel without Eilat. We cannot be expected to return to a dwarfed stature, with our face to the Mediterranean alone. In law and in history, peace and blockades have never coexisted. How could it be expected that the blockade of Eilat and a relaxation of tension in the Middle East could ever be brought into harmony?

After 3,000 years, accept Israel

These then were the three main elements in the tension: the sabotage movement; the blockade of the port; and, perhaps more imminent than anything else, this vast and purposeful encirclement movement, against the background of an authorized presidential statement announcing that the objective of the encirclement was to bring about the destruction and the annihilation of a sovereign state.

These acts taken together – the blockade, the dismissal of the United Nations Emergency Force, and the heavy concentration in Sinai – effectively disrupted the status quo which had ensured a relative stability on the Egyptian-Israel frontier for 10 years. I do not use the words "relative stability" lightly, for, in fact, while those elements in the Egyptian-Israel relationship existed there was not one single incident of violence between Egypt and Israel for 10 years. But suddenly this status quo, this pattern of mutually accepted stability, was smashed to smithereens.

It is now the task of the governments concerned to elaborate the new conditions of their coexistence. I think that much of this work should be done directly by these governments themselves. Surely, after what has happened we must have better assurance than before, for Israel and for the Middle East, of peaceful coexistence. The question is whether there is any reason to believe that such a new era may yet come to pass. If I am a little sanguine on this point, it is because of a conviction that men and nations do behave wisely once they have exhausted all other alternatives. Surely the other alternatives of war and belligerency have now been exhausted. And what has anybody gained from that? But in order that the new system of inter-state relationships may flourish in the Middle East, it is important that certain principles be applied above and beyond the ceasefire to which the Security Council has given its unanimous support.

Let me then say here that Israel welcomes the appeal for the ceasefire as formulated in this resolution. But I must point out that the implementation depends on the absolute and sincere acceptance and co-operation of the other parties, which, in our view, are responsible for the present situation. And in conveying this resolution to my colleagues, I must at this moment point out that these other governments have not used the opportunity yet to clarify their intentions.

I have said that the situation to be constructed after the ceasefire must depend on certain principles. The first of these principles surely must be the acceptance of Israel's statehood and the total elimination of the fiction of its non-existence. It would seem to me that after 3,000 years, the time has arrived to accept Israel's nationhood as a fact, for here is the only state in the international community which has the same territory, speaks the same language and upholds the same faith as it did 3,000 years ago.

And if, as everybody knows to be the fact, the universal conscience was in the last week or two most violently shaken at the prospect of danger to Israel, it was not only because there seemed to be a danger to a state, but also, I think, because the state was Israel, with all that this ancient name evokes, teaches, symbolizes and inspires. How grotesque would be an international community which found room for 122 sovereign units and which did not acknowledge the sovereignty of that people which had given nationhood its deepest significance and its most enduring grace.

No wonder, then, that when danger threatened, we could hear a roar of indignation sweep across the world, that men in progressive movements and members of the scientific and humanistic cultures joined together in sounding an alarm bell about an issue that vitally affected the human conscience. And no wonder, correspondingly, that a deep and universal sense of satisfaction and relief has accompanied the news of Israel's gallant and successful resistance.

But the central point remains the need to secure an authentic intellectual recognition by our neighbours of Israel's deep roots in the Middle Eastern reality. There is an intellectual tragedy in the failure of Arab leaders to come to grips, however reluctantly, with the depth and authenticity of Israel's roots in the life, the history, the spiritual experience and the culture of the Middle East.

This, then, is the first axiom. A much more conscious and uninhibited acceptance of Israel's statehood is an axiom requiring no demonstration, for there will never be a Middle East without an independent and sovereign State of Israel in its midst.

The second principle must be that of the peaceful settlement of disputes. The resolution thus adopted falls within the concept of the peaceful settlement of disputes. I have already said that much could be done if the governments of the area would embark much more on direct contacts. They must find their way to each other. After all, when there is conflict between them, they come together face to face. Why should they not come together face to face to solve the conflict? And perhaps on some occasions it would not be a bad idea to have the solution before, and therefore instead of, the conflict.

When the council discusses what is to happen after the ceasefire, we hear many formulas: back to 1956, back to 1948 – I understand our neighbours would wish to turn the clock back to 1947. The fact is, however, that most clocks move forward and not backward, and this, I think, should be the case with the clock of Middle Eastern peace – not backward to belligerency, but forward to peace.

The point was well made this evening by the representative of Argentina, who said the ceasefire should be followed immediately by the most intensive efforts to bring about a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. In a similar sense, the representative of Canada warned us against merely reproducing the old positions of conflict, without attempting to settle the underlying issues of Arab-Israel coexistence. After all, many things in recent days have been mixed up with each other. Few things are what they were. And in order to create harmonious combinations of relationships, it is inevitable that the states should come together in negotiation.

Another factor in the harmony that we would like to see in the Middle East relates to external powers. From these, and especially from the greatest amongst them, the small states of the Middle East – and most of them are small – ask for a rigorous support, not for individual states, but for specific principles; not to be for one state against other states, but to be for peace against war, for free commerce against belligerency, for the pacific settlement of disputes against violent irredentist threats; in other words, to exercise an even-handed support for the integrity and independence of states and for the rights of states under the Charter of the United Nations and other sources of international law.

These are still grave times

There are not two categories of states. The United Arab Republic, Iraq, Syria, Jordan, Lebanon – not one of these has a single ounce or milligram of statehood which does not adhere in equal measures to Israel itself.

It is important that states outside our region apply a balanced attitude, that they do not exploit temporary tensions and divergencies in the issues of global conflict, that they do not seek to win gains by inflaming fleeting passions, and that they strive to make a balanced distribution of their friendship amongst the states of the Middle East.

Now whether all the speeches of all the great powers this evening meet this criterion, everybody, of course, can judge for himself. I do not propose to answer in detail all the observations of the representative of the Soviet Union. I had the advantage of hearing the same things in identical language a few days ago from his colleague, the Soviet ambassador in Israel. I must confess that I was no more convinced this evening than I was the day before yesterday about the validity of this most vehement and one-sided denunciation.

But surely world opinion, before whose tribunal this debate unrolls, can solve this question by posing certain problems to itself. Who was it that attempted to destroy a neighbouring state in 1948, Israel or its neighbours? Who now closes an international waterway to the port of a neighbouring state, Israel or the United Arab Republic? Does Israel refuse to negotiate a peace settlement with the Arab states, or do they refuse to do so with it? Who disrupted the 1957 pattern of stability, Israel or Egypt? Did troops of Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, Lebanon, Kuwait and Algeria surround Israel in this menacing confrontation, or has any distinguished representative seen some vast Israel colossus surrounding the area between Morocco and Kuwait?

I raise these points of elementary logic. Of course, a great power can take refuge in its power from the exigencies of logic. All of us in our youth presumably recounted La Fontaine's fable, La raison du plus fort est toujours la meilleure. But here, after all, there is nobody who is more or less strong than others; we sit here around the table on the concept of sovereign equality. But I think we have an equal duty to bring substantive proof for any denunciation that we make, each of the other.

I would say in conclusion that these are, of course, still grave times. And yet they may perhaps have a fortunate issue. This could be the case if those who, for some reason, decided so violently, three weeks ago, to disrupt the status quo, would ask themselves what the results and benefits have been. As he looks around him at the arena of battle, at the wreckage of planes and tanks, at the collapse of intoxicated hopes, might not an Egyptian ruler ponder whether anything was achieved by that disruption? What has it brought but strife, conflict with other powerful interests, and the stern criticism of progressive men throughout the world?

I think that Israel has in recent days proved its steadfastness and vigour. It is now willing to demonstrate its instinct for peace. Let us build a new system of relationships from the wreckage of the old. Let us discern across the darkness the vision of a better and a brighter dawn.

A passionate faith in the justice of their cause

Address by then-Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Yitzhak Rabin on his acceptance of an honorary doctorate from Hebrew University on Mount Scopus, June 28, 1967.

On the Record

Mr. President, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. President of the Hebrew University, Mr. Rector of the Hebrew University, members of the board of governors, ladies and gentlemen:

I am filled with reverence as I stand here before the teachers of our generation in this ancient, magnificent place overlooking our eternal capital and the sacred sites of our nation's earliest history.

You have chosen to do me the great honor of conferring upon me the degree of doctor of philosophy, along with a number of distinguished persons who are doubtless worthy of this honour. May I be allowed to speak the thoughts that are in my heart?

I consider myself to be here solely as the representative of the whole Israel Defence Forces: of the thousands of officers and tens of thousands of soldiers who brought the victory of the Six Day War to the State of Israel.

It may well be asked why the university should have been moved to bestow upon me the degree of honorary doctor of philosophy, upon a soldier in recognition of his war services. What have soldiers to do with the academic world, which stands for the life of civilization and culture? What have those who are professionally occupied with violence to do with spiritual values? The answer, I think, is that in this honour which you have conferred through me upon my fellow soldiers you chose to express your appreciation of the special character of the Israel Defence Forces, which is itself an expression of the distinctiveness of the Jewish People as a whole.

The world has recognized that the Israeli army is different from most other armies. Though its first task, that of maintaining security, is indeed military, it also assumes numerous tasks directed to the ends of peace. These are not destructive, but constructive and are undertaken with the object of strengthening the nation's cultural and moral resources. Our work in the field of education is well known: it received national recognition in 1966 when the army won the Israel Prize for Education. Nahal, which already combines military duties with work on the land, also provides teachers for border villages, thus contributing to the social development. These are only a few examples of the special services of the Israel Defence Forces in this sphere.

Today, however, the university is conferring on us an honorary degree not for these things, but in recognition of the army's moral and spiritual force as shown precisely in active combat. For we are all here in this place only by virtue that has astounded the world.

War is intrinsically harsh and cruel, and blood and tears are its companions. But the war we have just fought also brought forth marvellous examples of a rare courage and heroism, and the most moving expressions of brotherhood, comradeship and even spiritual greatness. Anyone who has not seen a tank crew continue its attack even though its commander has been killed and its tank almost destroyed, who has not watched sappers risking their lives to extricate wounded comrades from a minefield, who has not witnessed the concern for a pilot who has fallen in enemy territory and the unremitting efforts made by the whole air force to rescue him, cannot know the meaning of devotion among comrades.

The nation was exalted and many wept when they heard of the capture of the Old City. Our Sabra youth, and certainly our soldiers, have no taste for sentimentality and shrink from any public show of emotion. In this instance, however, the strain of battle and the anxiety which proceeded it joined with the sense of deliverance, the sense of standing at the very heart of Jewish history, to break the shell of hardness and diffidence, stirring up springs of feelings and spiritual discovery. The paratroopers who conquered the Wall leaned on its stones and wept. It was an act which in its symbolic meaning can have few parallels in the history of nations. We in the army are not in the habit of speaking in high-flown language, but the revelation at that hour at the Temple Mount, a profound truth manifesting itself as if by lightning, overpowered customary constraints.

Yitzhak Rabin at Hebrew University June 28, 1967

The war they were fighting was a just one

There is more to tell. The elation of victory had seized the whole nation. Yet among the soldiers themselves a curious phenomenon is to be observed. They cannot rejoice wholeheartedly. Their triumph is marred by grief and shock, and there are some who cannot rejoice at all. The men in the front lines saw with their own eyes not only the glory of victory, but also its cost, their comrades fallen beside them soaked in blood. And I know that the terrible price the enemy paid has also deeply moved many of our men. Is it because their teaching, not their experience, has ever habituated the Jewish people to exalt in conquest and victory that they receive them with such mixed feelings?

The heroism displayed in the Six Day War generally went far beyond that of the single, daring assault in which a man hurls himself forward almost without reflection. In many places there were long and desperate battles: in Rafah, in El-Arish, in Um-Kal Um-Kataf, in Jerusalem and on the Golan Heights. In these places, and in many others, our soldiers showed a heroism of the spirit and a courage of endurance which inspired feelings of wonder and exaltation in those who witnessed them. We speak a great deal of the few against the many. In this war, perhaps for the first time, since the Arab invasions in the spring of 1948 and the battles of Negba and Degania, units of the Israel Defence Forces in every sector stood few against many.

Relatively small units entered long, deep networks of fortifications, surrounded by hundreds and thousands of enemy troops, through which they had to cut and cleave their way for many long hours. They pressed on, even when the exhilarating momentum of the first charge had passed, and all that was left to sustain them was their belief in our strength, in the absence of any alternative, and in the end for which the war was being fought, and the compelling need to summon up every resource of spiritual strength to continue to fight to the end. Thus our armoured forces broke through on all fronts, our paratroopers fought their way into Rafah and Jerusalem, our sappers cleaned minefields under enemy fire. The units which penetrated the enemy lines after hours of battle struggled on, refusing to stop, while their comrades fell to the right and to the left of them. These units were carried forward, not by arms or the techniques of war, but by the power of moral and spiritual values.

We have always insisted on having the best of our young people for the Israel Defence Forces. When we said "Ha-tovim la-tayis" ("the best for the Air Force") and this became a standard for the whole army, we were not referring only to technical skills and abilities. What we meant was that if our air force was to be capable of defeating the forces of four enemy countries in a few short hours, it could do so only if it were sustained by moral and human values. Our airmen who struck the enemies' planes with such accuracy that no one understands how it was done, and the world seeks to explain it technologically by reference to secret weapons; our armoured troops who stood their ground and overcame the enemy even when their equipment was inferior to his; our soldiers in all the several branches of the army who withstood our enemies everywhere despite the superiority of their numbers and fortifications: what they all showed was not only coolness and courage in battle, but a passionate faith in the justice of their cause, the certain knowledge that only their personal, individual resistance against the greatest of dangers could save their country and their families, and that the alternative to victory was annihilation.

In every sector, our commanders of all ranks proved themselves superior to those of the enemy. Their resourcefulness, their intelligence, their power of improvisation, their concern for their troops, and above all, their practice in leading their men into battle, these are not matters of technique or equipment. There is no intelligible explanation except one – their profound conviction that the war they were fighting was a just one.

All these things have their origin in the spirit and end in the spirit. Our soldiers prevailed not by the strength of their weapons but by their sense of mission, by their consciousness of the justice of their cause, by a deep love of their country, and by their understanding of the heavy task laid upon them: to ensure the existence of our people in their homeland, and to affirm, even at the cost of their lives, the right of the Jewish People to live its life in its own state – free, independent and in peace.

The army which I had the privilege of commanding through this war came from the people and returns to the people: a people which rises above itself in time of crisis and prevails over all enemies in the hour of trial by its moral and spiritual strength.

As representative of the Israel Defence Army and in the name of each and every one of its soldiers, I accept your appreciation with pride.

Protection of Holy Places

From 1948 to 1967, while the government of Jordan conrolled the Old City and east Jerusalem, all of the Jewish holy places, including synagogues and cemeteries, were desecrated. To ensure the physical protection of the places and shrines that fell under Israeli authority at the end of the Six Day War, the Knesset enacted the following legislation on June 27, 1967.

On The Record

Protection of Holy Places Law

1. The Holy Places shall be protected from desecration and any other violation and from anything likely to violate the freedom of access of the members of the different religions to the places sacred to them or their feelings with regard to those places.

2. (a) Whosoever desecrates or otherwise violates a Holy Place shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of seven years.
(b) Whosoever does anything likely to violate the freedom of access of the members of the different religions to the places sacred to them or their feelings with regard to those places shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of five years.

3. This law shall add to, and not derogate from, any other law.

4. The minister of religious affairs is charged with the implementation of this law, and he may, after consultation with, or upon the proposal of, representatives of the religions concerned and with the consent of the minister of justice make regulations as to any matter relating to such implementation.

5. This law shall come into force on the date of its adoption by the Knesset.

No peace, no recognition, no negotiations

On The Record

A little more than a week after the conclusion of the Six Day War, on June 19, 1967, the government of Israel offered to return the Golan Heights to Syria, the Sinai to Egypt and most of the West Bank to Jordan in return for the signing of peace treaties that would include the normalization of relations

Two months later, on Aug. 29, the collective response to Israel's offer came in the form of a summit conference attended by eight Arab heads of state in Khartoum, Sudan.

The Arab states utterly rejected Israel's offer in what subsequently became known as the "three noes of Khartoum," namely, "no peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with it."

The Khartoum response was a turning point in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

As historian and commentator Ami Isseroff has written, "The Khartoum resolutions weakened conciliatory voices in the Israeli government, and legitimized those voice who were calling for annexation of the conquered territories and Jewish settlement in them. They argued that in any case, it was clear that the Arabs would not make peace in the near future, and that the settlements would establish 'facts on the ground' and would pressure Arab governments and Palestinians to make peace.

"Consequently, on Sept. 24, the unity government led by Prime Minister Levi Eshkol announced plans for the re-establishment of a Jewish community in the Old City of Jerusalem (exiled in 1948 by the Jordanian Legion), the Etzion Bloc (kibbutzim on the Bethlehem-Hebron road wiped out by Palestinians in the war of 1948) and kibbutzim in the northern sector of the Golan Heights.

"Plans were also unveiled for new neighbourhoods around Jerusalem, near the old buildings of Hebrew University and near the Hadassah Hospital on Mount Scopus.

"This phase of the settlement plan was well within the Israeli consensus. Jerusalem was always considered a part of Israel, and Israelis were bitter at the destruction of the Jewish community of the Old City, which had existed for over 400 years. The Etzion bloc and other areas around Jerusalem were considered to be part of the 'corridor' and necessary to protect Jerusalem from a repeat of the 1948 Arab blockade."

The famous three noes were contained in Article 3 of the Khartoum Declaration. The following is the full text of the declaration:

1. The conference has affirmed the unity of Arab ranks, the unity of joint action and the need for coordination and for the elimination of all differences. The kings, presidents and representatives of the other Arab heads of state at the conference have affirmed their countries' stand by and implementation of the Arab Solidarity Charter, which was signed at the third Arab summit conference in Casablanca.

2. The conference has agreed on the need to consolidate all efforts to eliminate the effects of the aggression on the basis that the occupied lands are Arab lands and that the burden of regaining these lands falls on all the Arab states.

3. The Arab heads of state have agreed to unite their political efforts at the international and diplomatic level to eliminate the effects of the aggression and to ensure the withdrawal of the aggressive Israeli forces from the Arab lands which have been occupied since the aggression of June 5. This will be done within the framework of the main principles by which the Arab states abide, namely, no peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with it, and insistence on the rights of the Palestinian people in their own country.

4. The conference of Arab Ministers of Finance, Economy and Oil recommended that suspension of oil pumping be used as a weapon in the battle. However, after thoroughly studying the matter, the summit conference has come to the conclusion that the oil pumping can itself be used as a positive weapon, since oil is an Arab resource which can be used to strengthen the economy of the Arab states directly affected by the aggression, so that these states will be able to stand firm in the battle. The conference has, therefore, decided to resume the pumping of oil, since oil is a positive Arab resource that can be used in the service of Arab goals. It can contribute to the efforts to enable those Arab States which were exposed to the aggression and thereby lost economic resources to stand firm and eliminate the effects of the aggression. The oil-producing states have, in fact, participated in the efforts to enable the states affected by the aggression to stand firm in the face of any economic pressure.

5. The participants in the conference have approved the plan proposed by Kuwait to set up an Arab economic and social development fund on the basis of the recommendation of the Baghdad conference of Arab Ministers of Finance, Economy and Oil.

6. The participants have agreed on the need to adopt the necessary measures to strengthen military preparation to face all eventualities.

7. The conference has decided to expedite the elimination of foreign bases in the Arab States.

MARKHAM

Protection of Holy Places

Following the Six Day War of June 1967, the situation in the Middle East was discussed by the United Nations General Assembly, which referred the issue to the Security Council. After lengthy discussion, a final draft for a Security Council resolution was presented by the British Ambassador, Lord Caradon, on Nov. 22, 1967. It was adopted unanimously on the same day.

On The Record

This resolution, numbered 242, established provisions and principles that, it was hoped, would lead to a solution of the conflict. Resolution 242 was to become the cornerstone of Middle East diplomatic efforts in the coming decades.

Lord Caradon, Britain's ambassador to the UN, who presented Resolution 242.

The Security Council,

Expressing its continuing concern with the grave situation in the Middle East,

Emphasizing the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war and the need to work for a just and lasting peace in which every state in the area can live in security,

Emphasizing further that all member states in their acceptance of the Charter of the United Nations have undertaken a commitment to act in accordance with Article 2 of the charter,

1. Affirms that the fulfilment of charter principles requires the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East which should include the application of both the following principles:

(i) Withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict;

(ii) Termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every state in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force;

2. Affirms further the necessity:

(a) For guaranteeing freedom of navigation through international waterways in the area;

(b) For achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem;

(c) For guaranteeing the territorial inviolability and political independence of every state in the area, through measures including the establishment of demilitarized zones;

3. Requests the secretary general to designate a special representative to proceed to the Middle East to establish and maintain contacts with the states concerned in order to promote agreement and assist efforts to achieve a peaceful and accepted settlement in accordance with the provisions and principles in this resolution;

4. Requests the secretary general to report to the Security Council on the progress of the efforts of the special representative as soon as possible.

Adopted unanimously at the 1382nd meeting (of the Security Council).

The Quest for Jewish identity

Yaacov Herzog was a rare, uniquely skilled and talented individual. A rabbi, scholar and diplomat, he served many positions for the government and the people of Israel, including ambassador to Canada.

This address was delivered on Nov. 24, 1969, in Jerusalem at the President of Israel's Circle for the Study of the Diaspora.

By YAACOV HERZOG

It seems to me that the Six Day War, the reunification of Jerusalem and everything connected with these events have transformed the Jew's conception of himself to take into account the background of the new image of the State of Israel with a united and liberated Jerusalem at its centre.

On The Record

The question is not the image of the State of Israel as it appears to the Jew, but how the Jew sees himself. I think that fundamental changes have taken place among the Jews in the world. First of all, they now have an understanding of the return to Zion as a spiritual concept, something they did not have before. Secondly, they have an understanding of the concept of the Jewish people as a people that dwells alone, and of Jewish history in the context of the history of mankind. Thirdly, I believe that, for the first time in 150 years, they have entered an era marked by the quest for their own identity, in contrast to the flight from Judaism that was characteristic of the previous period.

All this is something new in the Jewish soul, with far-reaching implications for the future. The crises in Christendom, in the affluent world, in the communist bloc, in humanism, in the socialist movement have combined to create a cultural vacuum within which the Jew feels even more isolated than in years gone by.

On the one hand, there is the powerful lodestone of resurgent and victorious Israel, which has succeeded in overcoming the appalling perils of the period before the Six Day War and has established herself as a permanent factor in the Middle East, inspiring the Jew with a sense of his own identity. On the other hand, the counter-forces – the world of assimilation and spiritual extinction, the world that tends to obliterate Jewish identity is itself immersed in a painful crisis of the quest for its own identity.

Thus, when the Jew looks around him, he sees those trends in the civilization of mankind in which – so he tries to persuade himself – he could, of his own free will, find self-oblivion through assimilation and spiritual extinction overwhelmed by a volcanic eruption throughout the world, as humanity seeks itself.

These crises affect us daily and it is not difficult to enumerate them, but I would add one paradoxical factor. It was generally accepted in the past century that, as national frameworks were shattered and some kind of cosmopolitanism spread over the entire civilization of mankind, it would be easier for the Jew to be swallowed up and forgotten. The Jews in the affluent countries have made every effort to recover their equilibrium after the Holocaust, to explain it away in logical terms as the consequence of economic crises, social ferments, the affront to the self-respect of the German people after World War I and their quest for self-identity.

A new chapter has been opened in history

And yet, despite all these explanations, Jews in those countries cannot escape a sense of uneasiness, a kind of insecurity. This is an extraordinary development, which has become more and more obvious during the past four years. Previously, it was believed that anti-Semitism could no longer exist in a civilized human society, that the stronger civilization became, the more secure would be the position of the Jew. And now, suddenly, this confidence has been undermined, and the developments I have enumerated are closing in upon the Jew and pressing him to seek his own identity.

Thus, against the background of the status of independent Israel in the Middle East and the reunification of Jerusalem, with all its profound religious and historic significance for the Jewish soul, the world crisis of civilization and anti-Semitic manifestations – although many still hesitate to call them by that name – are keenly felt by the Jew. There are even some thinkers in the western world who compare the position of the Jews in the United States and western Europe with that of German Jewry in the 1920s. That seems to me to be a highly exaggerated view. But the very fact that Jews who do not hold the prophetic concept of Israel, of the dialogue between Jews and gentiles, that Jews with a universalist concept of world civilization, can admit such a possibility – and opinions to this effect have been published recently – shows how far the uneasiness has reached, if only in the subconscious of the Jew in the western world.

All this applies to the majority of Jews, those who have some kind of bond – religious, historic or even undefined – with Judaism. But I find in my contacts with what I might call "assimilated Jewry" – which comprises millions in the western world, especially in the universities and among the intellectuals – that even they have not succeeded in escaping that inner, spiritual shock that has struck Jewry as a whole.

This group may be divided into two sections. The one, which is seeking a way back, has joined in the quest for Jewish identity, though in its own way; the other – perhaps resenting the demand for identity – has found its place, in may quarters, at the head of the anarchistic "protest" movements.

Jews of the latter type are influenced by propaganda hostile to Israel. They want to suppress their spiritual shock, and so they go to extremes in the direction of cosmopolitanism. They seem to be trying to justify themselves by extravagant criticism of Israel without any objective basis.

Criticism is legitimate in a world of freedom of thought, and it is our duty to criticize ourselves, but they are going too far. The shock among these Jews is so profound that a man like George Steiner of Cambridge, who regards Israel as an imperialist monster, a nation that conquers and oppresses another nation, is nevertheless able to declare that if Israel's survival were in danger, he would be prepared to come and risk his life in her defence. This is a most extraordinary paradox; it is inconceivable that such a Jew could have spoken in these terms before 1967.

As we have seen, this shock is expressed mainly in the quest for identity. It gives rise to the idea of the return to Zion as a spiritual concept; it is expressed in the almost complete acceptance of the moral authority of the State of Israel; it is expressed in aliyah. On this last there are still various difficulties, but no one now objects to aliyah. Even among those who insist on the independence of the Diaspora or on the existence of a separate Diaspora stream in Jewish history, it is now permissible to talk about aliyah, or even to decide on aliyah.

Finally, it is also expressed in a readiness to strike deeper roots in Jewish education and expand the Jewish educational system in Diaspora countries. If what has been done in this sphere is still inadequate, that is largely our fault. But above all, there is the recognition of the validity of the return to Zion and the supremacy and centrality of Israel in the Jewish consciousness of our generation.

At the Conference of Leaders of Jewish Organizations, which met in Jerusalem at the beginning of the year, at the invitation of the late prime minister Levi Eshkol, we heard a leader of Reform Jewry in the United States get up and proclaim: "We are in exile!" This was a revolutionary admission, the outcome of deep heart-searching, profound spiritual crisis, constant quest and perplexity, the effort to adapt historic concepts of to the 20th century.

This is also true of the attempts of the better elements in the new left to wrestle with the problem of the Land of Israel and the bond between the land and the Jewish people for over 2,000 years as a historical concept, to view the claim of a Jewish right to the land against the 20th-century concept of self-determination.

Jews are no longer so shaken by the criticism levelled against us abroad as they were before 1967. Instinctively, as it were, they make common cause with us against this propaganda. They do not come to us and complain: "What are you doing in the occupied areas? The whole world is shocked. You are blackening our name in the eyes of the world." Perhaps they feel this, but they suppress their criticism. And this is not because of their admiration for us, but because they feel that they share with us a common fate; they feel that without us their lives would be meaningless.

These are fundamental changes that have taken place within the Jewish people. How this intellectual quest, this new spiritual direction, will find concrete expression against the background of world changes, it is difficult to foresee. But, as history has shown, developments of this kind have an impetus of their own, and they are not necessarily halted by changes in one direction or the other in this world of perpetual motion.

There is not the slightest doubt, it seems to me, that a cycle of 150 years of Jewish history – marked by self-deprecation and assimilation – which includes the Zionist aspiration "to be like all the nations" – has come to an end. The entire picture has been altered, a new chapter has been opened, and the Jewish people – and I believe this is the supreme manifestation of the change – is prepared to march forward with us into the unknown and, despite all its growing perils, into the future.

Canadian couple give new olim Rosh Hashanah to remember

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

SAFED, Israel — When the Tzahal Absorption Center in Safed suffered a direct hit from a Katyusha rocket fired by Hezbollah on July 13 – one of a barrage of rockets to fall near the centre – about 400 new immigrants from Ethiopia had already been moved to bomb shelters across Israel's north.

Some were separated from their children for the first time, opting to let them go to southern cities for safety. Prior to their arrival in Safed, most of the new immigrants had spent five to seven years in Jewish Agency-run refugee camps, waiting for their flight to Israel. For most, the Tzahal Absorption Center – the largest of three in Safed, built for families of seven members or more – became their first home in Israel just weeks before the outbreak of the war in Lebanon.

Herzl's children reburied in Israel

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

JERUSALEM — More than a century ago, Theodor Herzl, the father of modern Zionism, sat down to write his will. His heart was growing weaker and he feared his end might be near.

He stipulated his desire to be buried in the Jewish state – once it was established – alongside his children.

On Sept. 20, two coffins draped in Israeli flags containing the remains of Pauline and Hans Herzl were carried into the national cemetery named for their father and buried in the reddish brown earth of Jerusalem.

Herzl with his children, Pauline, right, Hans, and Margarethe, c.1900.
[Encyclopedia Judaica]

"Today, by bringing the bones of Pauline and Hans, we are completing the mission and completing a historic circle," Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said, speaking just a few feet away from the fresh graves, which were covered in sand and marked by small white plastic signs.

The two died within a day of each other in September 1930. Pauline after a long period of homelessness and possible addiction to morphine, and Hans by his own hand. Distraught over his sister's death, he shot himself in the head.

They were buried in a shared grave in Bordeaux, France. Their reburial in Israel ends a bizarre and dark chapter in Zionist history.

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Interfaith Group

EDMONTON — Muslims, Christians and Jews launched a local interfaith group Sept. 17 at Edmonton City Hall. The Phoenix Multi-Faith Society aims to "strengthen the bonds of harmony among Jews, Muslims and Christians," said the city's Catholic archbishop, Thomas Collins, who started the group with Jewish lawyer Sol Rolinger; ex-Tory MLA Larry Shaben, a Muslim; and police chief Mike Boyd.

Student Can Sue York

TORONTO — A student who was banned for three years from York University for his role in two anti-Israel protests can sue the school and its president for "public misfeasance" after the Supreme Court refused to hear York's appeal of a court decision not to bar that portion of his suit against the school. York's president, Lorna Marsden, suspended Daniel Freeman-Maloy, 22, last year for his part in campus protests in October 2005 and March 2004 against Israel's treatment of Palestinians, citing flagrant disruption of university life and unauthorized use of a bullhorn as reasons, the Globe and Mail reported. An Ontario court rescinded his suspension, and he sued York for libel, misfeasance and breach of academic freedom. York argues that its president isn't a public office-holders and thus can't be sued for misfeasance, and that a suit could limit academic freedom.

Reward Increased

NORTH BAY, Ont. — The reward for finding a Jewish boater who is presumed to have drowned on Lake Nipissing has been raised to $10,000. Hatzoloh, a volunteer-based emergency medical service in Toronto, had offered $3,000 to anyone who finds the body of its co-founder, Eli Horowitz, 30, of Toronto. The paramedic didn't return from a fishing trip Aug. 21 with his father-in-law, Heine Mondrowitz. The pair were in the North Bay area with their families. Their rented boat was found empty, and Mondrowitz's body washed up later on an island. The search for Horowitz intensified last week after a boater saw a body in the water near the island.

Bikers Raise $35,000

TORONTO — A Jewish motorcycle club raised $35,000 for a Tennessee school that collected millions of paper clips in memory of the Holocaust. Sandra Roberts, the Whitwell Middle School's principal, appeared Sept. 13 with Toronto's Sid Rochwerg, founder of the Yidden on Wheels biker club, at an event at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham. In 1998, Whitwell students decided to collect six million paper clips to help them understand the magnitude of the Shoah. They began receiving paper clips from all over the world as word spread about the project, which attracted media attention and was the subject of a documentary. In May, Rochwerg, a child of survivors, led a group of 70 Toronto riders to the school.

Jewish Leaders Meet Security Minister

MONTREAL — Jewish leaders met with Quebec Public Security Minister Jacques Dupuis earlier this month to discuss security concerns after the Sept. 2 firebombing of a Jewish school, the second such attack in just over two years.

The Sept. 14 meeting came just before the High Holy Days. The Jewish group consisted of FEDERATION CJA vice-president Marc Gold and chief operating officer Bram Freedman, along with Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, president Jeffrey Boro and director Joachim Normand.

"We were very pleased with Minister Dupuis' understanding of this important issue and his assurances that the security concerns of the community are being taken very seriously by the government and the police authorities. As well, we expressed to the minister that we are very pleased with the co-operation and understanding that we have received from the Montreal Police Force in investigating this latest attack on a Jewish institution," Boro said, referring to the firebombing of Toldos Yakov Yosef, a chassidic boys school.

WORLD

YU Gets $100 Million

NEW YORK — Ronald Stanton is hoping his $100-million (US) gift to Yeshiva University – announced earlier this month and believed to be the largest ever to a Jewish educational institution – will spur other Jewish philanthropists to give major donations to Jewish causes in general, and YU in particular. "There are plenty of people who could do it, but most substantial philanthropy goes to non-Jewish causes," said Stanton, 78, a New Yorker who made his fortune in petrochemicals and fertilizers.

Killings Are 'Fictions'

NEW YORK — Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir said Jewish groups are lying about violence in Sudan's Darfur region to raise money for Israel. Speaking Sept. 19 to the UN General Assembly, he said reports of deaths and refugees in Darfur are "fictions" and that those "who mobilized the people, invariably, are Jewish organizations." Jewish groups have been actively trying to end the killing of Darfurians by government-allied Arab militias.

Siblings reunited after 65 years

Simon Glasberg and Hilda Glasberg Shlick reunited after 65 years.

By LISA ALCALAY KLUG
Special to The CJN.

Sometimes, it truly is never too late. Holocaust survivor Simon Glasberg, 81, of Ottawa thought his sister had died during World War II. And Hilda Glasberg Shlick, 75, of Ashdod, Israel, thought her entire immediate family except for one sister had been lost to the Nazis.

But last week, although six decades have passed and the two have been separated by great distances, the brother and sister were reunited in Jerusalem.

A thankful Glasberg, overcome with emotion, couldn't stop kissing his sister. "I waited 65 years to give her a kiss… I'm so happy that I found the sister I love," he told reporters at a tear-filled reunion at Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial.

Although they were separated in 1941, Glasberg immediately recognized his sister Hilda.

"Nobody could believe it. She's alive," he said. "Of course I cried. The whole world cried."

A blend of technology and ingenuity led to the reunion of the two siblings. All her life, Schlick had believed her parents, four brothers and one sister had been murdered by the Nazis.

"For 65 years, I lived thinking I had no family besides one sister," said Schlick, who was as emotional as her brother.

The pair, who conversed mainly in Yiddish, were reunited thanks to the efforts of two of Shlick's grandchildren, Benny and David Shlick, who explored Yad Vashem's online Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names.

The archive, which contains some three million names of Holocaust victims, is at YadVashem.org. It has been visited by 10 million people since it was established two years ago. Biographical data submitted by families was originally recorded on paper and kept in large black binders that now line the walls of the Hall of Names as a silent memorial to those who perished during the Holocaust. Those files have been digitized in the database and are searchable online. Additional submissions can be made via the Internet.

This summer, after learning that their grandmother's maiden name was Glasberg, Benny and David went to the Yad Vashem website, where they found a page of testimony filed by another Glasberg sibling who survived the Holocaust, Karol Weiner. In his testimony, submitted shortly before he died in 1999, Weiner – whose last name was changed during the war for reasons the remaining family members can't explain – erroneously said that Shlick was no longer living.

David Shlick then continued the search: he explored the website of the Montreal Burial Society and online forums of survivors of Chernowitz, Romania, and eventually reached Karol Weiner's son, Eric.

Lessons from the U.K.

In last week's CJN, my colleague Sheldon Kirshner wrote about The Jews of Britain 1656 to 2000 by Todd M. Endelman.

The book was published this year to coincide with the 350th anniversary of the resettlement of Jews in Britain. Oliver Cromwell acceded to a request by Menasseh Ben Israel, on behalf of some of the formerly Portuguese Jews who were then living in Holland, for permission to immigrate to Britain.

Jews had been expelled from Britain in 1290 by King Edward I. And Cromwell, for his own reasons, not least of which was that he saw an opportunity to invigorate the English economy, responded favourably to Ben Israel's plea.

Endelman's account stops at the year 2000 but he does warn, as Kirshner noted, that the future of the Jewish community there is an uncertain one.

It is perhaps worthwhile that we continue Endelman's effort and sketch, even if only in thumbnail format, the condition of British Jewry since the year 2000.

Two Sundays ago, an estimated 25,000 people filled Trafalgar Square in London to celebrate Simcha on the Square, the culminating event in the year-long celebration of the 350-year anniversary. By all accounts, the occasion was festive and joyful, without incident or disruption. Security was low key.

Though low key in Trafalgar Square two weeks ago, security is very much a matter of high priority for our co-religionists in England.

As reported in The CJN recently, a 14-member, all-party parliamentary committee submitted a 58-page report to Prime Minister Tony Blair that warned of a rising tide of hatred against Jews.

The inquiry was chaired by Labour MP, former Foreign Office minister, Dennis MacShane and lasted some 10 months. It made 30 recommendations, all of which the government promised to study with a view to their implementation.

"After a year listening to evidence," MacShane told the Jewish Chronicle of London (JC), "we have come to the conclusions that there is a serious level of anti-Semitism in the U.K. We were particularly shocked by the number of physical attacks, which are an affront to any modern society. And we cannot accept that there should be a need for a group of British citizens to spend large amounts of money just to defend themselves."

The organized Jewish community, through the offices of the Community Security Trust, spent five million pounds last year in meeting the security needs of the many Jewish institutions. Unfortunately, the need for heightened security is starkly real. As noted in the JC, the report identified a "widespread change in mood and tone when Jews are discussed, whether in print or broadcast, at universities or in public or social settings."

The members of the commission expressed the fear that anti-Jewish remarks and attitudes "were gaining respectability and that there [was] a danger that this trend [was becoming] more and more mainstream." The report concluded that radical Muslims, the far left and parts of the media, were responsible for the increase in the anti-Jewish sentiments.

The worsening condition of the Jews of the United Kingdom was reported upon by Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) based in Jerusalem in its Annual Assessment 2004 -2005.

The JPPPI noted one of the significant "external" factors that affect the situation of the Jews of the United Kingdom. "The number of British Muslims has swelled and now accounts for 1.6 million, according to the recent census. Muslim influence in the media, on government and on politicians is growing rapidly and, in the opinion of some local leaders, alarmingly. Politically, Muslims are the fastest growing sector in the Labour party as well as in the smaller Liberal Democrat Party."

Compared to the 1.6 million Muslims, there are today, alas, fewer than 300,000 Jews in the United Kingdom, the same number, approximately, that lived there in 1914. In the mid-1950s, there were nearly half a million Jews in the United Kingdom. It therefore is bitterly true to conclude that Jews in the United Kingdom are a declining community.

The causes of the downward demographic spiral are not unknown to the Jews of the West. They are a result of, primarily, the combined effect of intermarriage, low birth rates and an aging population. There is also the added factor of emigration (primarily to Israel) fuelled by the sense of individual anxiety by what the 14 members of Parliament described as a "serious level of anti-Semitism in the U.K."

Canada is not the United Kingdom. The political, social and cultural reality of Canada is not that of the United Kingdom. Moreover, Canadian Jewry is one of three Diaspora communities that are actually growing in size.

But there are lessons for us to learn from the situation of the Jews of the United Kingdom.

Correction

In the paper last week, accompanying his stirring reminiscence of What The Six Day War Was Like for him, Stanley Plotnick was identified as the former president of UIA Canada. Of course, that depiction was incorrect. Plotnick is still very much the current president of UIA Canada. I apologize for and regret any embarrassment the error may have caused, especially to myself. – MBD

Commerce group urges investment in Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Business people, politicians and philanthropists gathered last week to urge Canadian Jews to invest in Israel's growing economy and give a boost to the newly formed Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, whose predecessor fell apart four years ago.

More than 160 people attended a reception, panel discussion and video presentation held at the Global Group Centre in Toronto to learn about investment and trade opportunities between Israel and Canada.

Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, as well as Israel's trade commissioner to Toronto Ephraim Shoham, interim president of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce David Rubin, and Global Upholstery chairman Saul Feldberg were just some of the people who urged the audience to become involved in the business group and invest in Israel.

Brosh said that while Canada is a good friend and ally to Israel, the two countries are still far from reaching the potential of bilateral trade between them.

"We should use the good experience Israel has with other countries and apply [that to Canada]. Israel has raised over $50 billion US in venture capital money over the past decade," Brosh said.

After showing a video with testimony from leaders of companies such as Microsoft and Hewlett-Packard that have profited from investing in Israel, Shoham noted that the United States has a closer economic relationship with Israel.

"Israeli companies do not dare put too much effort on the Canadian market, [but focus] mostly on the U.S. market. Israel exports yearly $12 billion of products to the U.S. and only half a billion dollars to Canada. This is not proportionate," Shoham said.

However, Shoham added that Canada exports $320 million of products, including software, diamonds and chemicals, to Israel and that over the past 2 1/2 years, Israeli exports to Canada have increased by 55 per cent – a rate of increase higher than Israel has achieved with any other country over the same period.

According to the Government of Israel Economic Mission to Canada, Israel's economy is vibrant and booming, and has the potential to benefit Canadian businesses that are willing to invest in it.

The economic mission reported that foreign investment figures for the first six months of 2006 amounted to $11.9 billion (US), which is already 20 per cent more than all of 2005, and that as of June of this year, the Israeli government had a budget surplus of more than $1 billion (US).

The organization also reported that the recent Israel-Hezbollah war had short-term effects on the economy, but "being a high-tech and export-oriented economy, Israel's economic development and growth depends mainly on the developments in the global economy. Therefore, the impact of a temporary local security crisis on the Israel economy is rather limited."

Some of the objectives of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce include creating and developing business ties between Israeli and Canadian companies, organizing business delegations and conferences for companies in both countries, and networking with key business and political leaders.

In an interview with The CJN, Gabriel Regev, Israel's deputy trade commissioner in Toronto, who helped organize last week's event, expressed frustration with Canadian Jews, who he said don't understand the importance of having this kind of organized body.

"The chamber of commerce is more than just trade and commerce. It is a showcase of Israel," he said.

Regev said that the original chamber of commerce disbanded about four years ago because there wasn't enough interest from the Jewish community.

He said that for years, Eli Rubenstein, of Canadel Inc., one of Canada's biggest real estate firms, which has been investing in Israel since the 1980s, financed the group out of his own pocket.

"There is a limit to what one individual can do. In the middle of 2002, [the group] ran out of money and there wasn't enough will, energy and interest to really create something there," Regev said. "I think it is important that this is being recreated. The complacency here, of the Jewish community is frightening. They think they are sitting here so safe and sound, but they are not."

Regev said that despite the fact Canadian Arabs don't have the history of political and economic influence that Canadian Jews have, Arabs have still managed to create a council – by modelling it after the structure of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce – that is better organized and more stable.

Whither the UN?

Last week was a very bad one for the United Nations. (Indeed, have there been any good ones for the disgraced and discredited organization these past few decades?) The institution was mocked by various leaders from the sanctuary of the very rostrum of the General Assembly and by others from the sanctuary of their respective imperious terrains.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the world's most vocal proponent of both Holocaust denial and genocide, was welcomed into the General Assembly, and he told the large gathering that "[A]ll our nuclear activities are transparent, peaceful and under the watchful eyes" of inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency. The fact that those same inspectors have frequently reported that Iran has repeatedly violated its commitments under international law and has frequently lied about its nuclear activities did not prevent Ahmadinejad from lying once again.

In his address to the General Assembly, the president of Venezuela and an Ahmadinejad ally, Hugo Chavez, called U.S. president George W. Bush "the devil himself." Then, in an odious and silly manner beneath the childishness of the lowest vaudevillian, Chavez said Bush had left the smell of sulfur hanging in the chamber from his appearance the previous day. But most surreal and saddest of all perhaps, was the appearance of Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. He accused human rights groups of exaggerating the crisis in Darfur. At a news conference he suggested UN peacekeepers were protecting Israel and accused Jews worldwide of spreading propaganda against his government. The hundreds of thousands already slaughtered in Darfur were less than an inconvenient detail to him. They were of no concern.

In Lebanon, Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah finally emerged from his hiding place last Friday to announce that "the resistance today has more than 20,000 rockets. We will not accept [disarming the resistance under this government]." With that openly triumphalist announcement, Nasrallah publicly ridiculed the United Nations, and especially its secretary general Kofi Annan, by brazenly flouting the entire rubric of Resolution 1701, Annan's instrument for ending the fighting between Hezbollah and Israel.

And then there was the secretary general himself who, in a pitiful presentation, implied that Israel's attempts to defend itself were morally equivalent to its enemies' attempts to destroy it, effectively lending credence to the Arab world's obsessive, distorted grievances against the Jewish state. "As long as the Security Council is unable to end... the now nearly 40-year-old occupation, by bringing both sides to accept and implement its resolutions... respect for the United Nations will continue to decline," Annan said.

With this embarrassing admission, the secretary general showed why the UN is but a withering, brittle vine on which there is now no hope for the growth of world peace. The shame of it all is mostly his, but the larger, profound pity of it all is ours. Woe to us.

Soviet foreign minister Andrei Gromyko told his Israeli counterpart Yitzchak Shamir that the USSR had reduced Jewish emigration because Jews were going to the United States rather than Israel. Their meeting at the United Nations was the first between Soviet and Israeli foreign ministers since 1974. Meanwhile, North American Jewry announced a campaign for Soviet Jews.

Hopes for united community

In 1959, Toronto was a city in which rabbis and lay people of all denominations could and did work together in harmony.

But the article "Toronto's Orthodox community: Is it becoming too religiously right-wing?" (CJN, Aug. 24 and 31) and the many letters you received indicate that there has been a drastic change. Even within the Orthodox community, there is division and conflict.

Since the demise of my good friend and colleague Rabbi Gedalia Felder, there has been no outstanding rabbinic authority who can command the respect of his peers and laymen in the community at large.

I hope the articles and letters will serve to remind our rabbinic and lay leadership that one of the most important mitzvot and values in Judaism is ahavat Yisrael.

The articles and letters have indicated that there are many in the Orthodox community who are being coerced and fear to participate in legitimate educational programs that are not approved by right-wing leaders.

It is a sorry state of affairs when Jewish people of different religious denominations refuse to speak to one another or to sit at the same table and discuss matters of local and worldwide concern. I hope and trust that these articles will be a wake-up call and that the Toronto Jewish community can become again a united Jewish community.

End loyalty to a party line

Philip Davidovits states that certain rabbis who do not espouse the views of Rabbi Shlomo Miller are "nowhere near as learned" as he, and writes that "maybe from a straight halachic [standpoint], there is no... position to take [other than that of Rabbi Miller's] ("Toronto's Orthodox community," letter, CJN, Sept. 7).

The hundreds of learned rabbis who belong to the Mizrachi, centrist Orthodox or modern Orthodox camps in Toronto and elsewhere will not write in their own defence. No rabbi worthy of the title would have the arrogance to vaunt his own learning, or to claim to be "as learned" as another, no matter how learned they might be. It is, therefore, up to their students to rise and defend their honour.

Davidovits' claims are part of a growing tendency to judge a rabbi's Torah knowledge according to his views on communal policy. Thus Orthodox publishers exclude Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik from a series of books on Torah scholars in America, despite his acknowledged mastery of Torah and piety, because Rabbi Soloveitchik's views on Zionism and secular education are not to their liking. And thus editors of haredi newspapers in Israel sideline the pronouncements of Rabbi Aharon Leib Steinman, head of one of Israel's largest yeshivot, because his views on army service are not popular among the haredi public.

It is time to end the growing tendency to see loyalty to a party line as the litmus test of Torah scholarship, and to return to the policies of the communal rabbis of the last generation, of whom Rabbi Gedalia Felder of Toronto and Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung of Montreal were prime examples. Rabbi Hirschprung actively encouraged studying the teachings of Rabbi Soloveitchik, on the one hand, and encouraged studying Chabad, on the other. Torah scholars of previous generations recognized that truth in Torah knowledge was not the property of a single camp. We ought to do likewise.

Greetings from the prime minister

It is with great pleasure that I extend warm greetings to the members of Canada's Jewish community on the occasion of Rosh Hashanah, the Yamim Noraim and Yom Kippur.

As you mark the beginning of the High Holy Days with the blowing of the shofar, you are honouring those traditions with which the Jewish community in Canada has enriched our great country. Rosh Hashanah is a time of celebration, surrounded by friends, family and sweet foods, but it is also a time for serious reflection, atonement and prayer for a good year and inscription into the Book of Life. As you approach Yom Kippur, it is my hope that you will be looking forward to the coming year with hope, joy and thanksgiving.

On behalf of my wife Laureen and children Benjamin and Rachel, please accept our best wishes for a happy, healthy and prosperous new year.

L'Shanah Tovah!

The Rt. Hon. Stephen Harper, P.C., MP
Prime Minister of Canada

Avinu Malkeinu
An extraordinary textual and musical design

By CANTOR DEBORAH RUTH STAIMAN

There was a drought during the second century CE. Rabbi Eliezer stepped down before the Ark and recited the 24 benedictions for fast days, but his prayers were not answered. Rabbi Akiva stepped down after him and exclaimed, "Our Father, our King, we have no King except You. Our Father, our King, for your sake have mercy on us." The rain fell. (Taanis 25b)

What began as only one line became one of the most important prayers of forgiveness in our liturgy for the High Holy Days: Avinu Malkeinu.

Some of the verses we still say are attributed to Rabbi Akiva. Other verses, with the same opening formula, were added from time to time in response to various persecutions or hardships that the Jewish people endured. This inspired the inclusion of several verses that ask God to inscribe us in the various "books" of good life, salvation, sustenance, merit, forgiveness and pardon. Since it was easy for different verses to become attached to the poem, more than one final version found its way into the many Machzorim (High Holy Day prayer books) around the world.

When I stand before the open ark singing Avinu Malkeinu, I feel, as may many of you, an intensity and urgency that is unmatched during the High Holy Day period. As I thought about why this was, several factors came to mind, making the reasons for the emotional impact of this prayer clearer. Perhaps you will identify.

First, unlike Kol Nidrei, which is said only once and on what might be considered the half-way point of the High Holy Day period, Avinu Malkeinu is included in the body of every service, starting with the Selichot service, and it is repeated on Rosh Hashanah, during the Ten Days of Repentance and throughout Yom Kippur day. The recurrence of the entire text over a period of approximately two weeks has its own psychological impact. This series of confessions and pleas inevitably takes on new nuances at every repetition.

Second, Avinu Malkeinu is always sung facing the open ark. As clergy, I am inches away from the Torahs, and there is nothing between me and the sacred scrolls. The focus of my congregation is on the Torah Scrolls. There is a certain vulnerability I feel when facing the ark, because God's presence is immediately felt when we stand before the Torahs.

Third, the prayer is a series of short verses, each beginning with "Our Father, our King." Considering the many repetitions of the beginning phrases within each recitation of the prayer and the multiple repetitions of the entire prayer, the compounded effect of addressing God as our protector and powerful master builds its own momentum, setting up both expectations and fears.

Finally, but not least, certain musical versions of Avinu Malkeinu have taken on such importance that if they were omitted, I would venture to say that the High Holy Days would not seem complete. I have in mind two melodies which the Jewish people tend to think of as coming from Mount Sinai; however, they are not as old as many of the missinai (from Sinai) tunes, such as Kol Nidrei and Aleinu, that are an integral part of the High Holy Day music.

The first melody is a folk tune. It is set to two verses of the text and is sung in unison by most Orthodox, Conservative and Reform congregations. The second, which is a much longer setting in both text and melody, has become a classic in many Conservative and most Reform congregations in North America. It is the Avinu Malkeinu written for cantor, choir and organ by the composer Max Janowski, who was born in 1912 in Germany and dedicated most of his adult life to the creation of Jewish music. When Janowski died on April 8, 1991, he had left a legacy of hundreds of compositions ranging from liturgical pieces for cantor to orchestral works.

Why do the folk tune and Janowski's melody for Avinu Malkeinu work? These are ideal examples of liturgical music that serves the demands of collective worship and the individual's need for prayerful expression. In their own respective ways, both pieces succeed in having two listeners: God and the worshippers. Music with which the worshipper is familiar and therefore participates in concerns humankind as much as God. Music where congregational participation is not absolutely necessary, primarily that which addresses God, stirs us humans to address our God.

The two pieces succeed in focusing on both God and God's supplicants. Every worshipper sings along with the folk version of Avinu Malkeinu, which invites the congregation to unite in one voice. The melody is written in the Ahava mode, a distinctly Jewish scale to which Jewish ears are either consciously or unconsciously sensitive. Through the repetition of a simple motif and the repetition of two phrases, it achieves a mantra-like affect which is hard to resist. We join the mantra, which aims at sending our minds and souls up to the higher sfirot.

The Janowski version aspires to the level of religious art, yet its seemingly artistic perfection is paralleled by its liturgical function. The melody, also in the Ahava mode, has attracted many Jewish souls the way it magically draws the listener right in, with its own mantra-like melody. Everyone hums or sways along as they meditate to the moving melody; yet, the prayer keeps some distance from the worshippers by its inclusion of an awe-inspiring cantorial and choral setting. Toward the end, the music soars higher and in its majesty, addresses God. We supplicants are made to reach toward the heavens with our hearts and our souls and therefore closer to God.

I believe that the appeal of Avinu Malkeinu during the High Holy Days is also deeply rooted in its music, particularly when it comes to the above-mentioned melodies. The musical setting by Max Janowski was so admired and moving that it became a genuine Reform tradition across the United States and Canada. In the process, it has become a staple of many Conservative congregations also.

The stage is set: multiple occurrences of the prayer, multiple repetitions of the phrase "Avinu Malkeinu," visible Torah scrolls in an open ark, and mantra-like modal melodies that speak to both the worshipper and to God. An urgency has been created through textual structure, choreography, words and music.

Why all this urgency? Why do I feel that if I don't sing with all the power my body and vocal cords have, then God may not hear my prayers and those of the congregation? Why are we given all these resources to help accomplish the task?

In Avinu Malkeinu, we confess to having sinned again and again, and then we plead with God to erase our sins and to inscribe us in all sorts of books which will put us in good stead. Yet what are these sins? Sometimes I feel that I am not really sure what is considered a sin. Although I have not participated in insider trading or mugged a pedestrian on a dark side street, why do I feel such a responsibility when I mouth the words of this prayer? Perhaps because I feel that I have sinned when I haven't called my family members enough times, or I didn't devote enough time to a friend in need or invite a stranger to Shabbat lunch. Perhaps I fear that I am not even aware of when I have sinned against my fellow brother or sister.

If I cannot recognize my own sins, how shall I ever be able to fully pray for forgiveness and expect God to have compassion upon me? How can I improve my score with God? Sins aren't to be put under a group heading. Each one should be identified separately so that it is not repeated during the year 5767.

As we approach the High Holy Days, we are again given the opportunity to pray our unique prayers of the season. We can prepare ourselves by searching our souls and identifying not only the obvious, but the hidden. Then, when you pray Avinu Malkeinu, you will have prepared your own stage and will thereby benefit that much more from the extraordinary textual and musical design that has been gifted to us.

When you sing, you pray twice. So sing from your soul, with your heart. The rest is in God's outstretched hands. Shanah Tovah. May you and your family be sealed in the Book of Life, bringing you health and sweetness in the year to come.

Epitaph for Yiddish

The printed program for the Ashkenaz festival, the Toronto celebration of Yiddish culture, contained prominent ads by two groups offering "secular Judaism." I doubt whether one would get very far in either group by speaking Yiddish. Nowadays, when Yiddish has ceased to be the language of the Jewish masses in eastern Europe, it's often evoked by Jews in the West in search of Judaism without God. Sadly, it is usually also Judaism without Yiddish.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Many who attended the three-day event at Toronto's Harbourfront earlier this month would probably not want to be seen in shul under any circumstances. Instead of looking forward to the Kingdom of Heaven, they would rather look back to an idealized past in the old country. To me – a Yiddish-speaking Jew born in Poland – the secular nostalgia seems infinitely more elusive than the hope that religion offers. Ashkenaz, excellent though it is and long may it continue, seems for some an escape from Judaism, not an affirmation of it. My commitment to Yiddish is part of my affirmation.

But for many, Yiddish seems to have become a substitute for religion. In Rethinking Modern Judaism, Arnold Eisen, the newly elected chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, writes persuasively about the power of nostalgia. Though his references are to traditional Jewish observance, they can also be applied to anti-traditional non-observance in the guise of love of Yiddish.

By listening to, and perhaps even singing, My Yiddishe Mama, some Jews try to reconnect with what once was the culture of their forbears. It's a vain pursuit, for their nostalgia is usually vicarious. It may have been alive for parents and grandparents when they came to the New World, but it's not so for their offspring. Most of the children don't know Yiddish beyond a few fractured phrases, and they're not likely to learn it now, despite all the courses currently on offer. Yiddish has become the mamaloshen, the language of mothers who are no more. It is not significant in contemporary Judaism.

There are good reasons to bewail this state of affairs, but it would be quixotic to try to revive Yiddish as the language it once was. Theoretically, Hebrew should have replaced it, but practically, English has become the lingua franca of the Jewish people. Most Jews in the world speak it as their first or second language.

All that is left today is to learn about Yiddish as though through a glass darkly. Scholars will continue to write about it and teach its history, and musicians will make us dance to their jazzed-up klezmer tunes at festivals, but, as we say in the mamaloshen, "Vos iz geven iz geven," which is rendered by some Yiddish speakers as, "Vot voz – voz."

Anyone need a shawarma expert?

Summer is now on its way out. Leaves are turning yellow, the bees are out in force, and the price of jackets is starting to rise. Our thoughts turn from air conditioning to heating, from iced to hot tea, from mowing to raking, and most importantly, from vacation to classes.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

This summer, I spent very little time doing things that could be construed as academically constructive. I painted my room. I read some books. I travelled to Israel (twice) for the weddings of my older brother and sister and spent nearly a month and a half there. I lounged, I relaxed, I breathed easy, I sat back, unwound and rested.

I didn't take any courses, as I did last summer. I had decided to slow down a bit at university. Working on projects day and night, getting two hours of sleep and drinking small oceans of coffee, all those are things of the past. I enjoy what I'm learning, but a full course load demanded too much of my already scarce sanity. In 20 years, I asked myself, will it matter if I took an extra year to finish my degree? I think not. In those same 20 years, will it matter if I am still sane? Probably, and I'm not going to chance it.

In Israel, I enjoyed many typically Israeli things that, for the most part, we simply don't have in Canada. I ate shawarma and falafel. I watched the sun set in Jerusalem. I saw some of the tourist attractions, like the Dead Sea and Masada, even though I'd seen them before. I visited family I almost never see and met some I never had seen. I ate some more shawarma.

Whenever we drove anywhere, I sat white-knuckled, wondering how anyone could be so crazy as to drive in the Jewish state. Israeli drivers are a mixture of fearless and suicidal. They tailgate. They weave through traffic like punch-drunk boxers. They speed and you can't guess their intentions when they begin to move. Israelis rarely if ever use turning signals. The typical Israeli driver is more aggressive than the craziest Canadian driver. The aggressive Israeli drivers seem to have a death wish. Motorcycles drive between two lanes of cars, probably in a hurry to deliver fast food. Of course, all this is occurring at 120 kilometres an hour, while the driver has one hand on a cellphone and is eating shawarma at the same time.

One thing I did not do this summer was earn money. It was a mixture of circumstance and procrastination, though I'd be inclined to lay the blame more on the former and my mother would blame the latter. I wrote a resume and left copies at a number of business places. I had several phone interviews. Then I left for Israel. Twice. Now I am bankrupt and beggared, destitute and down-and-out.

Summer is over, and I have little to show for it. My room is freshly painted, but it took only a month for it to return to the clutter it was before, but now it's a clutter with shining walls. I returned from Israel just in time to go to school, not even having time to buy books before classes began. My desktop computer finally went the way of the dinosaurs, taking with it my schedule and most of my personal files.

So now I find myself at the beginning of a new year. My non-existent finances and reduced school load mean I both need and have time for a job. I'm back where I was at the beginning of summer, except now I have to go to university as well. I would update my resume, but I don't really have anything new to put in, unless eating shawarma is an employable skill. Do you know anyone looking for a shawarma quality control specialist?

What's in a name?

I never thought of myself as having an interesting name until I came to King's College three years ago. While growing up in mostly Jewish settings, I was quite comfortable being Mordechai to friends and family, or going by the diminutive "Morry." Though not as common as some Jewish names, my name was recognizable enough to be "normal" and I was especially pleased when Purim came around and I was the star of the show (at least in my own mind).

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

When I began public high school in Hamilton, I always introduced myself as Morry. I suppose I was a little cautious about being in a new place, and therefore, I was trying to fly somewhat under the radar. Even if Morry wasn't your regular Joe or Mark name, it was at least eminently pronounceable. I figured that that if I went by Mordechai, I would have to put up with many botched "ch" sounds and have to constantly answer the question: "How do you spell that again?"

I thought that all would be the same once I got to university: I could hide behind my semi-normal nickname Morry and keep my full name reserved for family and Jewish friends.

But in actuality, I had very little choice as to what people in university would call me. The move-in day for freshmen at King's was on Shabbat, so I arrived in Halifax one day later than the rest of my cohorts.

The frosh leaders – those in charge of orientation activities – placed welcome signs with our names on them on the doors to our dormitory rooms. By the time I arrived on Sunday afternoon, there was a tremendous buzz going around the school that there was somebody in first year named Mordecai (pronounced with the hard "c"). My frosh group was thrilled to see me and informed me that they had called themselves "Team Mordecai" after their elusive late-coming member with the unique name. Often when I met people in the next few weeks, they had already heard of me because of my name.

It is a great name to have at a place like King's. Thanks to the bird in The Royal Tenenbaums and a certain Mr. Richler, people have heard of my name, but it is still different enough that it causes them to pause and appreciate it. Luckily, King's is a place where people wear their idiosyncrasies on their sleeves; so being a little out of the ordinary is not only expected, it is encouraged.

Some of my Jewish friends give me a hard time about the fact that people at school pronounce my name with the hard "c" and thus not the true way. But I don't mind. This is how my name is officially spelled and I prefer the hard "c" to a botched "ch." At least they're halfway there.

Jacques Derrida, a philosopher I have studied in the last few years, claims there is no such thing as a proper name. He means, among other things, that the name is the property of no one – even my own name does not belong to me – and that there is never complete symmetry between a name and what it names. According to Derrida, my name can never completely encompass who I am.

This thought agrees with me, especially since, over the years, I have managed to amass more than a dozen nicknames, each given to me by a different person in my life: Mordy, Uncle Mordie, Mordchele, Voldemordy, Mordefly and many others. Even those who call me Mordy spell it in different ways: Mordie, Mordy, Mordi or even Morde. People ask me: "What do you want me to call you? How should I spell your name?" And I answer, "However you like." And I mean it.

For me, a name defines a relationship more than it defines one single person. If we lived in solitude, we probably wouldn't need names because we would not be calling anyone anything. Therefore, if I had my choice, everyone I knew would call me something else, because my relationship with every person in my life is different. I think this thought is encapsulated beautifully by the poet Zelda in her poem Unto Every Person There is a Name: "Each of us has a name/ given by our parents… the stars… our neighbours… the mountains… our walls" and so on…

In this sense, each of my nicknames is as much my name as the one my parents gave me. I hope that I will continue to collect names as I journey through life and always be comfortable with having a multiplicity of names and pronunciations of these names.

The Kirshner File

Tragedy and cheap thrills at the film festival

At this year's Toronto International Film Festival, which ended Sept. 16, an Israeli and a Dutch movie were among the pictures that caught my attention.

The Bubble, directed by Eytan Fox and produced by Gal Uchovsky, delves into Tel Aviv's fizzy gay counter-culture, centred on and around cosmopolitan Sheinkin Street. But on a deeper level, this lively but ultimately tragic film turns on a doomed relationship between an Israeli Jew and a Palestinian Muslim.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto.

Black Book, by Paul Verhoeven, takes place in Nazi-occupied Holland in 1944 and 1945 and revolves around a Jewish cabaret singer who witnesses the gruesome murder of her parents, joins the Dutch resistance movement, befriends a Gestapo officer, fights off constant treachery and betrayal and finally ends up on a desert kibbutz in Israel.

The first scene of The Bubble – which unfolds in Hebrew and Arabic, with English subtitles – occurs at one of those ubiquitous checkpoints in the West Bank through which Palestinians pass.

One of the soldiers manning it is Noam (Ohad Knoller), a gay guy from Tel Aviv who is suddenly called upon to deliver a baby. As he tends to the robed Palestinian woman giving birth, Ashraf (Yousef "Joe" Sweid), a Palestinian from Nablus slightly younger than Noam, surveys the proceedings with an empathetic eye.

The scene shifts to hip Sheinkin Street, a narrow thoroughfare of trendy shops, boutiques, cafes and restaurants in the heart of Tel Aviv. Noam, a clerk in a record store, lives here. He shares a flat with Lulu (Daniella Wircer), a straight woman employed in a bath products shop, and Yali (Alon Friedmann), a flamboyant homosexual who manages a cafe.

Into their tight little world comes Ashraf, who gradually establishes a powerfully erotic friendship with Noam, and whose brooding eyes are a window into his personality. As their bond deepens, Yali hires Ashraf as a waiter. But in a reflection of endemic Arab-Israeli tensions, Yali asks Ashraf to call himself Shimi, after the Hebrew name Shimshon. Jokingly, Yali refers to Shimshon (Samson), the biblical figure, as "the first suicide bomber." Little does he know how prophetic he would be.

As the film proceeds, Fox adeptly weaves in two amusing subplots concerning Lulu's brief romance with a serial philanderer and Yali's comical fling with a talkative hunk. He also paints a colourful montage of Tel Aviv's gay night club milieu.

The Bubble, whose title is a half-jaundiced reference to the tendency of Sheinkin Street's beautiful people to cut themselves off from the harsh realities of the Middle East, adopts an unmistakable left-wing tone.

But a rave against Israel's occupation of the West Bank, which Yali, Lulu and Noam publicize and attend, is little more than an excuse for a beach party where kindred souls can socialize and hook up.

On a more serious political note, the film makes references to Israel's demolition of Ashraf's parents' home in eastern Jerusalem and the wave of suicide bombings that have plagued Israel.

Fox admirably succeeds in delineating the immense social and political distance between Israelis and Palestinians.

While Noam defends the checkpoints as necessary security barriers, Ashraf dismisses them as "propaganda." Yali is a tolerant fellow, but he is distinctly uncomfortable with Ashraf's presence in the cafe. As for Ashraf, he leaves the cafe in a huff when a Jewish magazine editor asks for his co-operation in a story about Tel Aviv through the eyes of a Palestinian.

At its best, The Bubble is a portrait of two societies and of their radically different attitude to gays. In Israel, gays and lesbians are free to enjoy their lifestyle, but in the West Bank, they are marginalized, demonized and scorned. To get by in Nablus, Ashraf has to pretend to be a heterosexual.

When he finally comes clean, on the eve of his sister's wedding to a glowering Hamas activist, she is outraged and unable to accept her brother's sexual orientation. Beyond this immediate conflict, the film is a microcosm of Israel's deadly struggle with the Palestinians.

Thanks to a plausible screenplay and credible performances from the lead actors, The Bubble is a feather in the cap of Israel's film industry.

Black Book is bold and bombastic, an action-packed thriller from the director of RoboCop, Total Recall, Basic Instinct, Starship Troopers and, yes, Showgirls.

It opens in Israel in 1956 as a bus threads its way along a road facing the Dead Sea. The vehicle pulls into a kibbutz and Dutch tourists pour out for a coffee break. A visitor recognizes an old Dutch friend, a Hebrew-language teacher named Rachel Steinn (Carice van Houten), whom she knew during the war. After they talk, Rachel sits on the shoreline and reflects on her past. Through the device of a flashback, the core of the movie, we're taken back to the summer of 1944, when Rachel was hidden by a Christian family.

Carice van Houten in Black Book.

Yousef "Joe" Sweid, Daniella Wircer, Alon Friedmann and Ohad Knoller in The Bubble.

Bombed out of her refuge by the Nazis, she joins her parents and a group of Jewish refugees on a perilous boat voyage to freedom. Their vessel is ambushed by a German patrol boat, and there is a bloodbath. Steinn's mother and father perish in a hail of bullets, their bodies stripped of money and valuables.

Rachel witnesses their cold-blooded killing as she cowers in a marsh. After joining the Resistance in Amsterdam and changing her name to Ellis de Vries, she is assigned to infiltrate Gestapo headquarters by ingratiating herself with Gestapo commander Muntze (Sebastian Koch). He quickly succumbs to her feminine charms.

Imagine the scene, if you can: a nice Jewish girl sleeping with a Nazi. It's not altogether implausible. Some Holocaust survivors in impossible situations were forced to jettison their scruples. But Black Book strains credulity when Rachel, in an incredible confession, admits that she is Jewish, and Muntze lets it go.

He is the sole decent German in the film, which excels at spinning webs of intrigue. Yet Black Book does not deal kindly with many of its Dutch characters either. The gruff farmer who shelters Rachel berates her at the kitchen table, claiming that Jews would have been better off had they "listened" to Jesus. Acutely aware of her hosts' prejudices, Rachel complains that she must rattle off biblical verses to eat.

Duplicity is always in the air. The Dutch lawyer who helps Rachel in her hour of need may be a collaborator, and the Dutchman who arranges the disastrous boat trip for Rachel and her parents is a traitor who preys on well-off Jews. Indeed, a Gestapo officer suggests that, without the help of Dutch collaborators, Germany could not have occupied Holland so easily. What an indictment!

Even members of the heroic Resistance come off as anti-Semitic. "Is the life of a Jew worth the life of a good Dutchman?" a man archly asks. In a reference to Jews, a woman says, "You can never trust them."

Black Book tries hard to be worthy of its theme, but it rarely achieves that goal.

Infused with a comic book sensibility and suffused with nudity, it seems more interested in providing pure, unadulterated entertainment than in tackling a serious topic.

Black Book might have been a first-rate film, but instead, it is merely a superficial, though well-crafted, potboiler that overflows with cheap thrills.

War sets back Ethiopian olim absorption schedule

New olim show commitment to Israel despite war

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA Federation

Evacuating newly-arrived Ethiopian immigrants from their absorption centres in the northern Israeli city of Tzfat (Safed) was a necessary safety measure during the recent war with Hezbollah, but the relocation wreaked havoc on their absorption schedule. Micha Feldman, senior advisor on Ethiopian Issues at The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) says absorption initiatives for Ethiopian olim (immigrants) have now been set back by at least two months. Feldman spoke with Jewish Toronto during a Canadian speaking tour, which included presentations to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto leaders.

The absorption process is also being supplemented by counseling and workshops run by psychologists and social workers knowledgeable about Ethiopian culture, designed to help them recover from the psychological scars of the war. For those who don't yet understand Hebrew, professionals who speak Amharic are being brought in. And while many of the children escaped the worst of the war, thanks to JAFI-organized summer camps in central and southern Israel, they now need additional support to deal with the residual anxiety and stress of being separated from their parents so soon after arriving in Israel.

Even without the psychological impact of the war, the Ethiopians "have a long way to go because they are black coming into a white society, they are the less-educated within the Israeli society, and 72% live below the poverty line, so it's not easy for them anyhow," explains Feldman.

Ultimately, however, the Ethiopian immigrants display a remarkable adaptivity and commitment to Israel, "in spite of all the hardships," says Feldman. During the war, those who remained in Tzfat approached the head of their absorption centre demanding weapons to protect their new home. In Ethiopia, they told him, they were used to defending themselves and their families when necessary. It had to be explained to them that the "war was conducted by rockets and not by rifles, but this shows you the attitude and the resolve of these people," Feldman says. After the ceasefire, "one would think that they'd refuse to go [back to Tzfat], but everyone went back to their absorption centre. Now they are living there and preparing for their move out to permanent housing."

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) began evacuating newly-arrived Ethiopian families, such as this one, to more secure areas of the country immediately after the conflict with Hezbollah began. (inset) Micha Feldman.

After the first katyushas hit the north, JAFI, with support from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – the first Federation to send emergency money to Israel –whisked children away to summer camps established in vacant youth villages, and adults were encouraged to stay with family outside the north or were placed in absorption centres in central and southern Israel. Those who remained in Tzfat benefited from more bearable bomb shelters, newly outfitted with air conditioning, televisions, DVDs, and games to occupy children too young to go to camp.

Upon their return to Tzfat, the immigrants were spared the insecurity of seeing their new home in shambles by the reconstruction effort already in progress. "With the help of the money that came from North America, everything has been repaired," says Feldman. "If you come today to Tzfat, which was hit by several katyusha rockets, you don't see any evidence of the war. Now it's in a better condition than it was before," he says with a laugh.

New birthright israel program honours memory of Andrea Bronfman

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA Federation

With winter just around the corner, Canada Israel Experience (CIE), organizers of the popular Taglit birthright israel trip have launched a series of new programs for the winter season.

Registration is now underway for four new programs and three programs from previous years which send 18-26-year-olds from across Canada on structured, 10-day sojourns to Israel at no cost to participants.

In Toronto, Taglit birthright israel is financially supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

One new program that's attracting a great deal of interest is the Andrea Bronfman Israel Arts Experience.

Held in honour of Andrea Bronfman, the late wife of Taglit birthright israel co-founder Charles Bronfman, the trip has a unique focus on arts and culture, Bronfman's lifelong passions.

She died tragically this past January.

"Through arts and culture, we will help participants explore their Jewish identity and create connections to the community and to Israel," explains Lorne Klemensberg, director of Israel programs for CIE.

Andrea Bronfman z"l

Scheduled to leave in December with 40 participants, the trip will include meetings, discussions and seminars about Israeli artists, sculptors, musicians, poets and filmmakers.

Program organizers note the fundamental aspects of the traditional Taglit birthright israel trip will still be part of the journey, but the trip will offer a special arts and culture twist for participants.

"It will maintain traditional components of the program, like going through the desert, but with this desert experience, they will perhaps meet a sculptor who makes desert art or talk with a poet who lives in the desert," says Klemensberg.

Toronto's Sydney and Florence Cooper, close friends of the Bronfmans, are funding the program.

After Andrea Bronfman's untimely death, the Coopers wanted to fund something in their late friend's honour and, knowing Bronfman's keen interest in both the arts and birthright israel, this new program was born.

"This is a program she would have embraced, and I think she would feel very good knowing it is going forward in her honour," says Sydney Cooper.

"She would appreciate it being focused on arts and culture."

Arts and culture aficionados are a target group for the trip and those interviewed for a journey spot would likely benefit from highlighting their particular arts and culture interests.

But organizers emphasize participants don't have to be arts and culture experts.

"You don't have to be an artist or art student to be accepted on this program," says Debbie Osiel, CIE's recruitment and marketing manager.

Other new CIE organized programs include Southern Exposure – The Great Winter Escape, which, as the name implies, centers on excursions to Israel's southern region, including the Red Sea, and visits with the southern Bedouins.

The Extreme Outdoor Desert Experience will offer adventurous activities such as rappelling and snorkeling.

And the new SEC Sephardic Heritage Israel Trip will explore Sephardic cultural ties.

For more information about all CIE Taglit birthright israel trips, visit www.israelforfree.com or call Debbie Osiel at 416-398-6931 ext. 349.

Toronto Lions roar into Washington

Toronto's Tobie Bekhor, (second from left), received the Kipnis-Wilson-Friedland Award at the recent International Lion of Judah Conference in Washington, D.C. A Lion of Judah (LOJ) is a woman who makes her own gift of at least $5,000 to UJA Federation's annual campaign. The award is presented to women who have made exceptional contributions to the Jewish community through philanthropy and volunteerism. Bekhor has been a dedicated volunteer with UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy for more than 30 years. (Pictured) Joining Bekhor are her sister, Lynda Latner (left), her mother Florence Cooper (second from right) and her sister-in-law, Clara Cooper. The four women were part of a 67-member contingent from Toronto who, along with 2,000 other women from around the world, heard from a variety of keynote speakers, including former U.S. president Bill Clinton and Pulitzer-Prize winning columnist Charles Krauthammer

Northern Israel residents strengthen chairman of Jewish Agency

UJA Federation campaign finances JAFI relief operation

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

The northern Israel rebuilding effort following the war with Hezbollah is being led by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), financed by the worldwide Jewish Federation network and headed by Zeev Bielski, chair of the JAFI executive.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto was the world's first Jewish Federation to establish an Israel emergency campaign once the war broke out. Today, UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, still strongly underway, has raised $52 million with $17 million designated for Israel's emergency needs. Emergency relief allocations will provide financial support for, among other services, vocational training to help those who lost their jobs get back to work; small business loans for northern Israel residents whose businesses went under; trauma counseling; temporary housing for the uprooted; and the restoration of social services to the elderly and other vulnerable individuals.

In this interview with Jewish Toronto, Bielski reveals to UJA Federation's Howard English how the war and its aftermath have affected him and the residents of northern Israel.

Q. How do you feel when you visit northern Israel today?

A. I feel very badly. You see boys in hospital who are my son's age. Sometimes, I come home almost falling apart, but I gain strength from the people who live there.

Q. What was the impact of Toronto's financial contributions during the war?

A. Toronto came forward immediately, which allowed JAFI to do what had to be done. We moved 40,000 kids from the north to the south and the centre of the country. But it wasn't just the money, it was the feeling that you had someone behind you. We took a risk on some of our decisions because we knew that Toronto was there.

Q. How much damage are we dealing with in the north?

A. The government of Israel will be paying 1.5 billion shekel (approx. $387 million Canadian) for damage plus another 1.5 billion shekel for various northern projects. The Jewish Agency will be raising $300 million U.S.

Q. What will that money allow the Jewish Agency to do?

A. Among the other projects that require funding, Toronto's donations will allow us to provide scholarships for college students who could not work during the war to earn their tuition. We'll be able to offer up to 50% of the cost of schooling.

The Jewish Agency brings a week of fun to the North

On a recent balmy September afternoon, Pnina Levy breathes a sigh of relief. The 27-year-old social worker from the northern Israeli city of Acco, which was bombarded during the war with Hezbollah, is enjoying a day of fun and outdoor activities with her two young children, sponsored by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas agency.

"It feels so good to take the children out to something cheerful and festive," says Levy. "The children in the north did not have any summer vacation at all. These activities give them a feeling that maybe the holiday hasn't quite yet finished.

Anis Ali, a Muslim resident of Acco, also breathes a sigh of relief. He is enjoying the Jewish Agency's "Children's Village" with his three small children. Employed as a welder in Haifa, Ali was without work throughout the war.

"My wife Rozette is a caregiver in a senior citizens home, so she worked throughout the war," says Ali, as his son pulls him to a carousel. "I was at home taking care of our three young children. We only left our small apartment to seek refuge in the communal bomb shelter. Even today, my eight-year-old daughter still jumps at the sound of loud noises and my youngest son points to the sky as if expecting a missile to fall. It's just nice to be here and forget everything for a while."

For an entire week, the Jewish Agency provided tens of thousands of children and their families with fun and relaxing activities in major northern cities. Clowns made traumatized children laugh. Well-known performers encouraged people to sing and dance. Rides, complete with cotton candy and popcorn, and adventure sports gave the event a carnival-like atmosphere. All was free of charge for residents of the north.

The Jewish Agency played an essential role in supporting Israel's citizens during the war, most notably providing 40,000 children with safe summer sleep-away camps. Now, the Jewish Agency's energies are fully invested in returning life to normal and rebuilding the north. Recreational and entertainment activities give people like Levy and Ali the chance to forget, at least for a while, the traumas that the war brought them. For some, even the chance to leave their apartments brings a sense of relief.

"Every time the sirens sounded my husband, myself and our two children crowded into our bathroom for shelter," says Levy. "Since then, every time I use the bathroom I remember the terrifying hours we spent there and a sense of fear wells up in me."

Guy Shlezinger, the DJ for the event, spent the war dodging katyusha rockets in his native Haifa. "The hardest week of the war was the week after," he says. "Going back to work and doing even the most mundane tasks like driving to the supermarket was difficult. We had to convince ourselves that it was safe to venture out. That's why events like this one are so important. They give a feeling of returning to normalcy."

Concert to raise funds for Israel Emergency Campaign

The Three Tenors from The Holy Land will be performing a special one-night only concert in Toronto this December in support of the UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks.

The concert, which will be held at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Synagogue on December 12 at 8:00 p.m., is being produced by Show One Entertainment and Toronto's Alexander Shnaider, co-founder and chairman of the Board, Midland Group.

Alexander Shnaider

"I'm happy to say that my portion of the proceeds from this event will be allocated to UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign," says Shnaider, who like the three tenors, was born in the former Soviet Union. "Having lived in Israel in the past, I feel it is my duty to help out in any way that I can. UJA Federation does a great job of raising awareness for Israel, and supporting this cause is one way for those of us living abroad to help provide for Israel's continued well-being."

Jewish-Muslim dialogue to be 'major plank' at JTS

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Even after 20 years on the faculty of Stanford University in northern California, Philadelphia native Arnold Eisen says it's hard for him to think of himself as a "west coaster."

But the chancellor-designate of the Conservative movement's New York-based Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) said in a telephone interview last week that if there is anything he brings to his new position in the way of west coast sensibility, it's that he's "relaxed about some things [that] people consider a crisis.

"I see numbers dropping in the Conservative movement, but I see them dropping in Judaism generally. I see tremendous success stories [in Conservative Judaism]," said Eisen, referring to schools and summer camps in particular.

In the United States, the Conservative movement – formerly the largest Jewish denomination – has been surpassed in recent years by increasing numbers in the Reform movement.

Eisen's own background in the counter-cultural chavurah movement in the late 1970s and subsequent leadership in the Conservative movement is not an isolated example, he noted.

Conservative Jews are overrepresented in chavurah-style independent minyans, many of which have "strong interactions" with organized movements and institutions, he added.

Currently the chair of the department of religious studies at Stanford, Eisen is on leave and will teach one last course in the spring. He is commuting to New York one week a month so his son can finish his last year of high school in California.

He said that in his new role, which becomes full-time next July, he will insist that JTS continue with its commitment to scholarship, but he noted that he wants to "bring that scholarship to bear on the issues of the day.

"We're not just here to advance knowledge. We're here to use knowledge for good."

Although JTS has already been involved with Jewish-Muslim dialogue on a limited basis, Eisen – who was instrumental in setting up an Islamic studies program at Stanford – said such dialogue will now be "a major plank," adding that "These are difficult times."

He believes that religion, unlike politics, is a "natural" common ground for Jewish-Muslim dialogue.

Arnold Eisen

But religion, in general, has "gotten a bad name lately, and been dragged in the dust by people who do bad things in its name."

Eisen believes there is a need for Jews to "demonstrate that religion can be a force for good in the world.

"[Conservative Jews] have something to model not just for other Jews, but for other societies, that there's no conflict between open-mindedness and fidelity to tradition."

The Conservative movement has a long-standing commitment to interfaith dialogue, as well as fidelity to tradition, Eisen noted.

That tradition is being challenged with the upcoming December vote by the movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards, the Rabbinical Assembly's authority on Halachah, regarding the question of rabbinic ordination for gays and lesbians.

Eisen, who is not a rabbi, is in favour of gay ordination, but defers to rabbinic authority in determining whether or not it is halachically permissible.

The next step for JTS, if an accepted rabbinic tshuvah endorses the move, will be consultation and discussion with faculty and students. In that case, Eisen expects a decision will be made by early spring.

He does not foresee a split in the movement, despite the likelihood that opposing tshuvot will be accepted as valid.

"The Conservative movement has always prided itself on its ability not just to disagree but to come together. There have been a lot of disagreements before. It hasn't led to a split in the movement [although] we lost some congregations because of the decision to ordain women."

Conservative Judaism is "much larger" than the gay/lesbian issue, Eisen stressed. "There is much more that unites Conservative Jews."

And the divisions are not necessarily what one might expect. At Eisen's synagogue in Palo Alto, Calif., there would "never" be instrumental music played on Shabbat, in accordance with a more traditional stance. However, in a more liberal expression of Jewish tradition, the Jewish matriarchs – not just the patriarchs – are included in prayers. At a Conservative congregation he visited recently in Atlanta, the situation was exactly the reverse.

"It's an interesting mix," he said. "I think it makes for a stronger movement."

Jewish and Muslim students find common ground

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Seven Jewish students and eight Muslim ones learned that they had more in common than they imagined when the Jewish group visited a Muslim school in Scarborough last week.

The Grade 8 students from United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tzedec branch visited the NAMF Junior Academy, an affiliate of the North American Muslim Foundation (NAMF), on a trip facilitated by the Canadian Centre for Diversity, the programming division of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

Judy Csillag, the centre's manager of special projects, acknowledged that the meeting took "a certain amount of bravery," and told the students that the event was "of great importance. You've come together and shown this city and the world that we can be friends and we can communicate."

Canada, she told them, "is a country that celebrates your heritage. You can still be a good Canadian and still celebrate your own heritage."

This year, in a rare occurrence, Rosh Hashanah and the beginning of Ramadan – the Muslim holy month of daylight fasting and prayer that culminates in the celebration of Eid al-Fitr – coincide. Although Jews and Muslims both use a lunar calendar, the Muslim one is fixed at 354 days, meaning holidays can fall at different times of year, while the Jewish calendar adds a month every second or third year over the course of a 19-year cycle, keeping the Jewish holidays at roughly the same time of year.

Farooq Khan, executive director of NAMF, told the students that "given the global context in which we live, we need to develop understanding."

"I think it's important that we send a positive message that different communities can live and coexist together," he told The CJN. He noted that a speech competition organized by NAMF for Islamic schools is now open to all, and said he is looking forward to a reciprocal school visit.

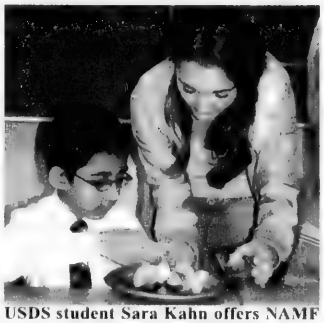
Reaction by NAMF parents to the Jewish school's visit was positive, Khan said. "Pretty much everybody said it's a good idea."

Kaila Budd, a USDS mother who accompanied the students, said that there were some initial reservations, but she was "very touched and very warmed by the reception" the school received.

Marianna Ludwick, who teaches grades 4 to 8 at NAMF told the guests from USDS that academy students are taught to respect everyone. Students at the school, although they are all Muslim, have a wide variety of backgrounds and countries of origin, she noted.

Her colleague Rola Muhanna, who teaches grades 2 and 3, said the school emphasizes that students live in a multi-cultural society while incorporating Islamic values such as "helping each other" into the curriculum.

Academy students share a common heritage, but "they are Canadian kids," Khan told The CJN. The two-year-old school, which runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 7, combines secular studies with Islamic education including the study of Arabic and the Qur'an.



USDS student Sara Kahn offers NAMF Junior Academy student Zillullah Mohammedi apples and honey as part of an interfaith student event.

Among the common denominators that emerged as children and staff from each school shared their customs were similarities in language (Shalom and Salaam both mean "peace" and are used as greetings) and certain dietary restrictions such as not eating pork, as well as the fact that both Muslims and Jews trace their origins to the patriarch Abraham, and that children begin to fast on Ramadan and Yom Kippur at about the same age.

The Jewish students arrived with a variety of ritual items, including a shofar, tallit, tfillin, a siddur and candlesticks, as well as a challah and apples and honey to share in honour of Rosh Hashanah.

Michal Gill, USDS campus principal, said her students would make presentations to their peers about the visit.

"We say to the kids, 'The future is built on this young generation.' The future looks very bright to us," she told the mixed group, who shook hands and wished each other "Salaam" and "Shalom," after the USDS students sang the Israeli song Od Yavo Shalom (Peace will come).

USDS student Orli Matlow told the group, "We live in the Jewish community and it's like a tiny bubble. I was excited to get a chance to branch out, make new friends, sing and learn about you guys, too."

Rabbi Sean Gorman of Beth Tzedec Congregation, who accompanied the group, extended wishes for "an easy fast, [and] a meaningful one."

The meeting was "so good," said USDS student Sara Kahn, who noted that her friends and acquaintances are virtually all Jewish. "I thought there would be differences, but there ended up being so many similarities."

"I didn't actually know our religions were a little close," said NAMF student Omar Bekri, who is in Grade 5. "I think it was nice, and I learned about [Jewish] symbols and the horn [shofar]," he said of the event.

"I didn't really know much about the Jewish religion," said Grade 5 NAMF student Ayan Mohamed. As a young girl who wears a hijab, she found it particularly interesting to learn what Jews "use to connect to God," referring in part to the tallit, or prayer shawl.

Helping to Rebuild Israel's North

Aforestation, sustainable development, desertification and water resource management should be among the critical issues and challenges that face us in Israel today. Participating in international environmental conferences, where we have the opportunity to brainstorm and share our expertise and cutting edge technology, should be our only focus in providing solutions to Israel's pressing ecologic needs.

Instead, what we are faced with today in northern Israel is the devastation of Israel's natural resources on an unprecedented scale. The loss of crops, farmland and forests has been immense and the industrial and agricultural heartland of Israel has been dealt a severe blow.

For over 105 years, the Jewish National Fund has been able to adapt to Israel's changing needs, and the current crisis is no exception. Through our Operation Security Blanket, we have provided for all people in need. We have helped restore a sense of normalcy and calm for as many children as possible by sending them to summer camps and field schools out of range of katyusha rockets. The JNF has directly operated these camps and paid for all transportation, activities, food and security needs for these evacuees from the Galilee.

The rockets have also caused extensive and devastating fires in northern Israel. From the beginning of the war, 12 JNF firefighting teams have dealt with more than 600 forest fires more fires than would be ordinarily experienced in a five-year period. More than 12,000 dunams (3,000 acres) of planted forests and natural woodland containing almost 1,000,000 trees of various types have been destroyed. The JNF has provided fire trucks, personal safety equipment for the firefighters, and fire retardant chemicals to combat the fires and contain the damage. It will take many years to rehabilitate the forests and restore the trees and farmlands.

In responding to the urgent situation in Israel, the JNF has consistently been active on the ground. Operation Security Blanket will continue to provide real and tangible benefits for all the citizens of Israel. Support thus far from JNF communities around the world has been extraordinarily generous. However, the need to rebuild, replenish, replant and re-develop is ongoing and we are being called upon to continue the effort for at least another six months. This is clearly the time to demonstrate our solidarity for the people of Israel – and JNF has led the way.

As we prepare to celebrate the High Holidays, I would like to take this opportunity to wish you, your family and friends health, happiness, and prosperity for 5767. But let us also offer our condolences to the families of Israel's fallen soldiers and the many civilians who have lost their lives in recent weeks; let us wish a speedy recovery to the thousands who have been injured; and let us hope and pray for the safe return of Israel's captured soldiers.

Let us all hope and pray for peace for Am Yisrael.

Le'shana tova tikatevu ve'tichatemu.

Keeping the doctrine of faith

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

It's a funny world we live in. A few cartoons can ignite worldwide fury, flames, mass demonstrations, indignation, vandalism violence and even killings for weeks on end.

Now, once again, the sensitivities of the Muslim faithful have been offended. None other than the Pope himself has publicly quoted the words of a medieval Byzantine emperor that were considered irreverent to Islam and its prophet Muhammad: "Show me this what Muhammad brought that was new and there you will find things only evil and inhumane, such as his command to spread by the sword the faith he preached." This time however, the response has been so mild that it's almost benign. Yes, there have been calls for an apology and a re-examination of the comments, as well as calls to stop defaming the religion of Islam, but not much else.

Through A Sephardi Window

What I find most fascinating in this episode is that a man such as the Pope should find fault with the blood spilled in the name of Islam while conveniently overlooking his own church's history. So much blood has been spilled in the name of Christianity over the past 2,000 years that even the greatest Muslim jihadist would have to pause in awe and admiration. The Crusades across Europe and the Middle East, the pogroms and blood libels, the inquisition – all of these were initiatives of the church. And the Holocaust was, in large part, the culmination of this history of church-sanctioned violence.

Surely the Pope knows this. He has to know this. Before becoming Pope Benedict, Cardinal Josef Ratzinger's position was that of the Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith, which is no more than the modern name for the Office of the Inquisitor General. Cardinal Ratzinger's job as inquisitor general was to correct the ways of wayward priests and wayward people. Through history, his very office dealt with millions of "heretics" who were corrected by the church using the most hideous (and perhaps even evil and inhumane) techniques, including fire, torture and the sword. Cardinal Ratzinger's zeal in his past post was such that it earned him the unfortunate name (or fortunate, depending on your perspective) of "God's Rottweiller."

But let's set issues of hypocrisy aside for just a minute and focus on the actual text of the quote. "Evil" and "inhumane" is pretty strong stuff. By quoting these sentiments, the Pope is propagating something he obviously believes, something he wishes his followers to also believe. He, of course, has every right to speak his mind, and in fact it's his duty to teach accordingly. Equally, his listeners have the same right to either accept or reject his words.

As Jews, we have no Pope or any such titular head. Instead we have scholars who, by virtue of the calibre of their scholarship alone are recognized as scholars. Who is it that recognizes them? We, the people, do. This is done without a ballot, without a vote or even without a nomination. The Jewish people as a whole make this determination. These scholars, present in every generation, are the final word in matters of theology.

Last year, a well-intentioned haredi rabbi named Nosson Slifkin had his published works banned by these same scholars for his attempt to reconcile Torah beliefs and current scientific thought on questions such as of the age of the universe and the origins of life. These scholars found that his theories were inconsistent with Torah and indeed heretical. The scholars were doing no more than their job as our keepers of the doctrine of the faith. By informing us of the failure of these words, these scholars have signalled that we need not study them as truth, incorporate them into our system of belief and certainly not quote them. If some consider this process to be censorship, so be it. One should be welcoming of such censorship.

Bicycling to atonement

By A. MARK CLARFIELD

Yom Kippur is the holiest day in the Jewish calendar. Around the world, no matter how un-affiliated we might be the rest of the year, almost all of us go to synagogue on Yom Kippur. We go to fast, pray, consider our sins and beg forgiveness – both from God and our fellow man.

Growing up in Toronto, I remember walking solemnly to shul on the morning of the holiday – my brother, sister and I usually trailing our parents on the 20-minute ramble down to Beth Sholom Synagogue on Eglinton Avenue. I recall wondering, as we ambled along and watched the cars go by, why everyone else wasn't walking and fasting, why the whole world was not on its way to shul. After all, everyone I knew had taken the day off, either from school or work, and no one would ever have considered driving his car on such a day. Even the few non-Jewish kids at my public school took the day off. And if you needed a Jewish doctor, it was best to try the nearest shul.

As kids, we were also forbidden to listen to the radio, watch TV or ride our bikes.

So after we moved to Israel, it was with the greatest of surprise that we experienced our first Yom Kippur here. It's not that the whole country doesn't come to a standstill – it does, and the sudden lack of modern industrial noise is striking. No office, school, restaurant, business or gas station is open for business. Radio and TV stations are all off the air. While the phone system functions, there are no long distance operators at work and the 411 information services are off.

As a doctor, I can attest to the fact that hospitals are open, but just barely. Emergencies are dealt with, but everything else must wait. Oddly enough, patients seem to know how to delay all serious illnesses until the end of the holiday. I don't envy physicians on the immediate post-fast shift.

As well, in Israel, beyond the devotion to religious issues on this day, one suffers from the recurring memory of a near national catastrophe, the Yom Kippur War of 1973. Thousands were killed, many more were maimed and the near-success of the Arab armies in defeating Israel has left a scar that has never completely healed, despite the passing of more than 30 years. Try as we might, it's difficult not to transmit these painful memories to our children as we approach the Day of Atonement.

That being said, the loveliest aspect of the day is that, apart from the occasional ambulance or police cruiser, there is virtually no motor vehicle traffic on Israel's roads on Yom Kippur. An unearthly and beautiful calm descends on the country as the roads empty of traffic as the holiday approaches.

Interestingly, no civil law demands such compliance. No religious Jew would think of driving on Yom Kippur, but they also wouldn't drive on Shabbat. Yet Israel's roads are full on Saturdays, with cars being driven by the approximately 80 per cent of citizens who consider themselves secular. But on Yom Kippur, by mutual and completely voluntary consent, no private cars are driven. Doctors on call either sleep in the hospital or stay with friends close by so as to allow them to walk in if they're needed.

This of course doesn't mean the roads are empty. As one would expect, they are full of people strolling to and from synagogue, or simply walking down the middle of the country's highways in order to experience the unearthly feeling of traversing otherwise forbidden territory. Can you imagine strolling down a major highway with thousands of other Canadians, with nary a car to be seen for more than 24 hours?

But while the roads are free of cars, buses and taxis, they're not entirely free of wheeled conveyances. And I'm not thinking of baby carriages, although there are plenty of those around. Rather, I'm referring to a sudden efflorescence of cycles: mainly bicycles, but also unicycles, bicycles built for two (or even three), tricycles, mountain bikes, five-speeders, 10-speeders and 30-speeders. As well, there are legions of children on Rollerblades and foot-propelled scooters.

Despite the religious solemnity of the day and the difficult memories of war, the children appear immune to their parents' painful considerations. It seems that almost every kid in Israel, from age three to 23, is out on a bike. Streets, sidewalks and highways are packed. And being kids, they aren't all that careful. While some children walk their bikes, take friends for rides or pedal slowly, some speed downhill at breakneck speed, and some ride with "no hands" or weave among pedestrians and slower riders.

In fact, every year at the end of the fast, the evening news reports how many babies were born at home (or in an ambulance en route to the hospital), how many elderly people fainted in shul from dehydration and how many children were hurt in bicycle accidents – 134 last year.

I give my kids the same advice each year: wear your helmet, drive carefully, be careful of other bikers and above all, don't knock over any pedestrians, especially elderly ones, as that would be particularly embarrassing to your geriatrician dad. You would have more than God to apologize to on this highest of Judaism's High Holy Days.

Jewish Life

A woman of valour

At the Mercy of Strangers: Survival in Nazi-Occupied Poland* by Gitel Hopfeld, Mosaic Press and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Many who were fortunate enough to survive the Holocaust feel compelled to tell their singular story. Each account is important in comprehending the full nature of the tragedy. Some of these memoirs take on a form of sanctity, as they reflect on matters of life and death and the awesome mystery of God's will.

At the Mercy of Strangers is a clear, brief account of how a brave and indomitable Jewish mother and her two children managed to overcome a variety of perils at a time of widespread inhumanity.

On one occasion, they were pursued by a brutal peasant who had discovered their hiding place and was eager to betray them. The author writes, "Unexpectedly, my 10-year-old son ran over and bit the peasant's hand so viciously that he let me free for a second. I ran away with all my strength and my children followed me. The tall peasant gave up chasing after us and returned to his companions."

Once, when she was viewed suspiciously by a group of soldiers and police officers, Gitel and her children could not retreat. Instead, they confidently approached the enemy, and the young daughter raised her voice and said, "Mamma, hurry up. The cows are not milked, the chickens are not fed, it's late…"

"'Yes, Zosia. You are right. We have a lot to do,' I replied aloud as we passed by the soldiers and continued on our way. I wanted to bend down and kiss my eight-year-old daughter for displaying so much wisdom and courage in the face of mortal danger."

On another occasion, when danger loomed, Gitel pushed her daughter into a dog's kennel. The dog crouched behind the kennel until a policeman had left the vicinity. A Polish couple couldn't believe their eyes when they saw young Zosia unharmed by their wolfhound. "It's a miracle, a real miracle!" exclaimed Duzynec, while his wife crossed herself several times before the icon of the Holy Mother.

What is noteworthy about this engrossing story of triumph over circumstance is the help and kindness offered the fatigued, helpless, impoverished Jewish trio by Polish acquaintances and strangers. These protectors included a leader of the Polish underground army, the supervisor of a railway station and assorted Polish soldiers and priests.

Under severe and constant stress, the author indicates that she became nervous and superstitious, no longer sure who she was or what to believe. "Whenever I passed an open shrine on the road or in a field, I would stop and murmur a short prayer: 'Lord, Jesus! See that your goyim do not kill me. Have mercy on my two children, amen!'"

Gitel Hopfeld died in 1969, in Israel, where she had immigrated after the war to begin a new life of hope and meaning. Simcha Simchovich, the author's nephew, is the editor and translator of this book from the Polish. He is a well-known Toronto Yiddishist, poet, novelist and scholar.

In his introduction to the book, he writes, "Reading Gitel's memoir one cannot help but be impressed by the strength of her character, her industriousness and her abilities to find ways to save her children in the incessant, day-to-day struggle to survive. She was indeed a woman of valour, a Jewish heroine in the darkest time of our history."

The meaning of Viddui

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The right hand is clenched into a fist.
Words of confession are recited.
The heart is lightly struck.
Ashamnu, bagadnu, gazalnu…
We have sinned, we have betrayed, we have stolen…

Those actions and words are repeated time and again over the course of Yom Kippur as people recite Viddui, the traditional confession prayer. But despite their familiarity, the meaning of Viddui can be a mystery. To truly get the most of the Viddui service, now is the time to read up on the meaning of this profound service.

"I have to confess that I don't think I do a very good job of confessing my sins." Sound familiar? I think that many people share Art Braufman's sense of caution as they approach Viddui. Braufman has done some soul-searching, and has written a lengthy but readable essay about the history and power of Viddui. For example, he asks why fully one-third of the Viddui statements refer to the sins of speech. And then he quotes this insight: "Most of us have hurt few people with our fists or our feet, but we have hurt many with our words. The tongue is a dangerous weapon. The sages say it is guarded by a fence of teeth and two lips, yet it gets out and does damage. How often have we cut down a person with a quip? How often have we carried tales and sullied a reputation?" [http://tinyurl.com/e7xuw]

The Viddui comprises two dozen Hebrew words presented in alphabetical order beginning with ashamnu (we have sinned) and ending with titanu (we have misled others.) But that doesn't mean "there are only 24 sins or kinds of sin; rather, it is meant to convey that we as individuals and as a community have sinned 'from alef to tav,' or, as we say in English, 'from A to Z.'" So begins a handy 12-page booklet produced by the Israel Torah Center, which you can download. It contains the entire Hebrew text of the Viddui, a literal translation into English and a brief commentary putting the sins into context. [http://tinyurl.com/eejwc]

The 24-word Viddui is said at various times during the year and by some Jews almost on a daily basis. However, on Yom Kippur, the Viddui continues with the Al Chet prayer. This longer and more specific list of 44 statements includes a catch-all confession: "Forgive us the breach of positive commands and negative commands, whether or not they involve an act, whether or not they are known to us." Rabbi Shraga Simmons explores each of these statements in detail. [http://tinyurl.com/haexz]

Rebbetzin Tzipporah Heller says that despite its length, the Viddui is not meant to induce paralyzing guilt. She points out that the word chet does not mean sin. Rather, it is an archery term that means "missing the mark." [http://tinyurl.com/fqf3o] Rabbi Goldie Milgram continues the metaphor. "Judaism understands you to be constantly developing and capable of changing your trajectory." [http://rebgoldie.com/ashmnu.htm]

Not surprisingly, I have come across certain updated "Viddui" services. Meir Tamari's Business Ethics Checklist looks at the Al Chet in a modern context. This is how he explains sinning in eating and drinking: "Modern-day gluttony [goes] far beyond eating and drinking. Always wanting to have 'more' creates a search for a constantly rising standard of living, often through dishonest means. Conspicuous consumption and exaggerated consumerism are also a betrayal of basic standard of self-control." [http://www.daat.co.il/daat/english/index.html]

The Israel-based Rabbis for Human Rights has created a confession for the ills they see plaguing Israel and the Jewish people, including:

- For the sin… of ignoring or turning our heads away from the disabled.
- For the sin… of denigrating new immigrants and failing to honour their traditions and cultures. [http://tinyurl.com/hrdp9]

Finally, the author of the Thoughts of Judaism blog has taken a step back, looked at his relationship with his children, and has composed a personal "Al Chet for my kids":

- For the sin of not playing catch because I was too tired.
- For the sin of not giving you my undivided attention while I was responding to e-mail.
- For the sin of not taking your dreams more seriously.
- And for the sin of not repenting all of this sooner. [http://tinyurl.com/fxxgk]

Grant will help expand Shoah writing contest

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Rarely has an Ontario cabinet minister sounded as effusive about Holocaust education as when Mike Colle, the minister of citizenship and immigration, announced a $12,000 provincial grant last week to help fund a creative writing and art contest for students.

Colle announced the funding Sept. 21 at a special luncheon, co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, before about 100 survivor speakers and docents of the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, which runs the contest.

The contest, for Ontario students in grades 8 to 12, has existed for years. Last year, there were more than 250 entries from across the province in both writing and visual arts, all with the Holocaust, genocide or racial intolerance as their theme.

In the past, said Lorraine Sandler, chair of the Holocaust Centre, funding allowed for only one winner in each medium, with the prize being an all-expenses paid trip to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Sandler said the extra money will allow not only for more prize winners, but will provide better access to teachers and school boards across Ontario by enabling the centre "to spread the word of this competition so that hopefully we will have thousands of children applying for this award."

Colle, a onetime high school history teacher, said the funding will help ensure that the Holocaust is "not only not forgotten, but is in our curriculum in everything we do – in writing, in movies, in every educational format possible."

He told the Holocaust survivors: "We must dedicate ourselves to incorporating your stories and the reality of what happened so that nobody can dare say it didn't happen, or revise it, or interpret it for their own means."

The minister mentioned that this past April, his Liberal government announced $500,000 in funding to expand Baycrest's Holocaust Resource Program to support educational and social programs for aging survivors.

At the time, Colle helped open Baycrest's Café Europa, which provides emotional support, recreational activities and social interaction to Holocaust survivors.

Last week, he recounted his own visits to the Washington museum and to Anne Frank House in Amsterdam.

He said he hopes that the latest grant "will be the beginning of a growing partnership. There is no doubt we have to do it."

Colle said he and Premier Dalton McGuinty both feel "we have to do this or else our education system will not be complete [and] our government cannot really be complete unless we make a serious investment in Holocaust memorial activities. This is something that we feel we have to partner [with]."

"We cannot just let others do it, because the threats, the ongoing peddlers of hate, are just too strong and too numerous. So it is not going to be enough for us as a society… to just do the minimum. We have to continue to find ways of encouraging, educating, fostering and honouring."

He called the grant "another little bit of concrete action that invests in a very critical role I think we all have."

The minister also quoted Holocaust scholar Elie Wiesel: "To remain silent and indifferent is the greatest sin of all."

Sandler said the extra funding will help "build a community of conscious children who begin to care, to ask questions, to research, to come up with their own pieces of information [so that they will] not believe fairy tales and dogma, but to really understand what it is in a community to care about one's brother and one's neighbour."

Tourism official touts Israel as his term ends

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Tourism consul Dani Shahal, who returns to Israel this week after heading the Israeli Government Tourist Office in Toronto for the past five years, says he'll miss the city and the many friends he and his wife have made here – but not the Canadian winters.

While the 62-year-old Haifa native has also served in the Netherlands and South Africa, he said he likes Toronto best.

"Besides the winter, I think that Canada is the most attractive place for someone to work and live," he said in an interview in his seventh-floor Bloor Street office, decorated with an Israeli flag, maps and framed portraits of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon. "I wouldn't say it's a paradise, but the people and the environment are wonderful. The warm Jewish community here are the biggest supporters of the State of Israel, I believe, in North America."

Soon after his arrival here, Shahal told The CJN of his rather grandiose ambition to see the number of Canadians visiting Israel soar dramatically above the 50,000 who came in 2000, until then the best tourism year for Canadians. His goal, he said in 2001, was to see 100,000 Canadians visiting annually before his term was through.

Although that goal wasn't achieved, Shahal is convinced it's still a realistic target for the short term.

"I'm quite sure that if the situation will continue as it is – I'm not speaking of peace, but relative quiet in Israel – within two years we can reach the number of 100,000 Canadians coming to Israel," he said.

Some 70,000 Canadians would have gone to Israel this year, but the war this summer in Lebanon sent a chill through the tourism industry, he said. But while the five-week-long conflict generated many cancellations, the tourism industry has since rebounded, so it "wasn't a disaster like the second intifadah."

Dani Shahal

By the end of 2006, some 55,000 Canadians are expected to visit the Jewish state, still a significant rise above the 53,500 who visited in 2005, he said. (Neither figure includes the roughly 10,000 annual visits by Israelis who live in Canada and return to Israel to see family and friends.)

During his Canadian posting, Shahal and colleagues travelled the width and breadth of the country, from Halifax to Victoria, recounting Israel's multiple charms as a tourist destination to countless Canadian audiences, hoping to persuade them to come see for themselves.

"We visited almost every synagogue and Jewish community organization and many, many churches in order to bring people this message," he said.

Shahal said he's grateful to have had an opportunity to see "the beautiful landscape of Canada," which has given him some "very good memories." He and his wife Idit, who worked in the Israeli consulate, are already planning to return to Canada next summer for a vacation in the Rockies.

In the meantime, he said they're looking forward to going home to Israel "to be with our two daughters and our two granddaughters, who were born while we were here."

Even as his official duties conclude, Shahal continues to spread the message wherever he goes, especially among community leaders and the media, that Israel is a safe and uniquely intriguing place to visit.

And the prices right now, he can't help but add, are quite favourable for tourists.

"I saw an ad for a flight on El Al, plus five days in Israel, all for $1,199," he said. "It's fantastic."

Wiesenthal remembered

By LEO ADLER

Simon Wiesenthal died one year ago on 16 Elul, 5765, Sept. 20, 2005.

I am now in Geneva with the top leadership of the Simon Wiesenthal Center: rabbis Marvin Hier and Abraham Cooper, the dean and associate dean of the centre, and Shimon Samuels, director of international relations and head of the centre's Paris office. We are here to present the views of Israelis who were subjected to crimes against humanity during the recent Israeli-Hezbollah conflict.

I find it ironic to be attending meetings of the United Nations Human Rights Council on the very eve of the anniversary of Simon Wiesenthal's death, because the same issues that plagued the old League of Nations are also plaguing its successor, the United Nations. Yet here we are, in the same city and the same hall where the League died an ignoble death and where the original United Nations Commission on Human Rights also came to an unlamented end. Their demise was due to the same illness: the implicit and explicit acceptance of bigotry and intolerance, the failure to be fair and judicious in affairs of state and the disregarding of the threats that democracies faced.

Then, as now, the way the world treated Jews and the threats to Jews were a harbinger of future events.

Almost 70 years ago, in 1938, at a meeting called to discuss the issue of "German Jewish refugees," the world's reluctance to protect Jews from Adolf Hitler's stated goals was obvious. No nation but the Dominican Republic offered to accept Jewish immigrants.

Now we are back in Geneva to once again "discuss" with the world's representatives the threat posed by those who want to kill Jews.

Seventy years ago, Wiesenthal was a young architect with a lifetime of creativity before him. The failure of the international community to effectively deal with Nazism, fascism and the anti-Semitism that was then very much in vogue, not only changed world history, it also transformed Wiesenthal from a distinguished architect to a distinguished symbol of humanitarianism.

There are, in my view, two examples of how Wiesenthal's inherent character was instrumental in his ability to become the man the world honoured at the time of his death last year.

In his book, The Sunflower, Wiesenthal wrote of how he and other concentration camp inmates (Jewish and non-Jewish) discussed a request for forgiveness he had received from a dying Nazi who had murdered Jews. Rather than wallow in his own predicament, rather than take advantage of the situation to better himself, rather than kill the soldier when they were alone, rather than disregard the Nazi's request, Wiesenthal, ever aware of the intertwining of morality, humanity, religion and ethics, wanted to be sure he was making the right decision. He therefore consulted others who had different perspectives. To his death, he always wanted to do what was right and just.

A few years later, shortly after being freed by the Allies and while the reality that he and his wife had lost more than 90 family members was just sinking in, Wiesenthal was approached by other former concentration camp inmates. They had formed a vigilante group and asked him to provide names of guards who had abused him and whom he had witnessed killing other Jews.

He refused, and in that moment, despite all the trauma and suffering he and his family had undergone, he conceived the idea of seeing justice done, not only for victims and survivors, but especially for perpetrators.

While the Allies held war crimes trials that lasted only as long as it took for the Iron Curtain to descend, and while countries opened their arms and closed their eyes to immigrants, no matter what their past conduct or misconduct as Nazis, soldiers or civilians had been, Wiesenthal dedicated himself to operating a centre that would remember those who died, those who lived – and those who murdered.

Unlike the diplomats, governments and politicians who saw war crimes as a one-time prosecutorial endeavour that would end reasonably soon after peace treaties were signed, Wiesenthal envisioned an ongoing justice system that would never rest as long as any war criminals remained at large. Unlike the prevailing belief that state leaders could not be made accountable for their policies of crimes against humanity unless they lost a war, Wiesenthal held to the notion that no political leader should ever be above the rule of law.

When the Cold War replaced World War II, Wiesenthal was alone in pursuing justice. He was ignored or ridiculed by almost all, including the Jewish community. His call for trials and the need to never put a time limitation on war crimes and crimes against humanity were seen as "unrealistic."

His instrumentality in the arrest and trial of Adolf Eichmann, the chief bureaucrat in charge of the "Final Solution," finally led to a gradual change in the world's perception of Wiesenthal's view of what constitutes justice, especially as he spoke out against ongoing genocides in Asia and Africa and Europe.

Throughout his career, he never veered from what he had said and practised while he himself was in the camps: that only through a sustainable, internationally accepted and viable justice system would the world be spared future catastrophes.

While he recognized that this goal was still far from being achieved and that the International Criminal Court and the tribunals were not yet up to his standards, he was satisfied that he had succeeded in inculcating the notions of political responsibility (the arrests and trials of Chile's Augusto Pinochet, Serbia's Slobodan Milosevic, Liberia's Charles Taylor and others) and no time limits to war crimes into today's legal precepts.

Wiesenthal's life was filled with both personal and public achievements and accomplishments. For me, though, it was his never-ending search for a just justice, rather than simply a staged justice, that stands out – especially here in Geneva.

Leo Adler is the director of national affairs of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies in Canada.

We stood fast with Israel

In a few days, during the waning hours of Yom Kippur, we will be reciting one of the most meaningful and beautiful prayers of the entire year. As Neilah begins and the holiest of days comes to an end, we ask that our prayers pass through the gates of Heaven, while they remain open, so we can take advantage of this divine window of opportunity. Just as God does not want to close the gates on us, so we never want to close the gates on our fellow Jews.

David Engel

That is the challenge we faced as a community this past summer, when war broke out and a storm of terrorist rockets rained down on Israel. These were among the most difficult days in Israel's short history.

I am intensely proud that we as a community more than met the challenge. We met the challenge of global leadership and we met the challenge of standing with Israel without hesitation from the minute the war began. Our remarkable response will, one day, make Jewish history.

Within a week, a coalition of more than 100 Jewish and non-Jewish organizations – under the organizational leadership of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region, and the Canada Israel Committee – put together a massive Stand with Israel rally that was attended by 8,000 people. On the same day, a special meeting of the community's most generous philanthropists raised $6 million toward the fledgling UJA Federation Israel Emergency Campaign, now underway, chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks.

In fact, Toronto was the world's first Jewish community to initiate an Israel Emergency Campaign, which allowed the Jewish Agency for Israel – UJA Federation's overseas partner – to provide immediate relief for residents of Israel's wartorn north. Today, the remarkably generous contributions from members of our incredible community are being sent to Israel on a regular basis to help rebuild Israeli lives.

We opened our hearts in other ways as well. In the heat of war and after the rockets stopped, many of us boarded planes to Israel to show that we can raise morale as well.

Wherever Jews live, wherever they are in need, we are opening the gates to provide help and hope, with the resolve that no window of opportunity to demonstrate our responsibility for each other will ever pass us by.

Thank you for participating in this eternal task. On behalf of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, I wish you, your families, the people of Israel and Jews everywhere peace, health and happiness in the New Year.

Teacher tries to keep things 'lively and off-kilter'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dan Mendelsohn Aviv was on track for a PhD in literary theory at Loyola University in Chicago in the 1990s, but he couldn't bring himself to go through with it after he began teaching at local Jewish schools so he could pay his bills.

"I was too interested in teaching at the day school," he said in a recent interview in his classroom at Bialik Hebrew Day School, where he teaches Grade 7 and 8 students Hebrew-language classes in Bible, Jewish history and social studies.

Realizing he "probably should professionalize" himself, he switched his major to education, qualifying as a teacher in Illinois, and continuing his studies in Israel, where he met his wife, Noa, a Canadian.

Mendelsohn Aviv received his master's and PhD in Jewish education from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1999 and 2002, respectively.

Sometimes people ask why he teaches middle school when his education qualifies him to teach at a higher level. "The short answer is, 'I like it,'" the 36-year-old father of two said.

Also, he added, studies show that students around bar and bat mitzvah age are at a "pivotal" time in terms of identity formation. Using the metaphor of building a house, he noted that the foundation is "the hardest part to put in."

Ideally, he would like to remain involved in both the theoretical and practical areas of education, and he has continued to speak at conferences and write for academic journals since he began teaching.

"Jewish studies is very relevant to Jewish education, but without it being applied in the actual classroom, you're adding to this huge pile of [academic] paper."

To keep his students interested, he tries to "keep things lively and off-kilter."

Every week, he has a class lottery to determine who gets to sit on "the couch," a comfy upholstered chair with matching footstool at the back of the class. To qualify, students draw cards from the oversized Darth Vader Slurpee cup Mendelsohn Aviv keeps on his desk. The student who draws a card with a smiley face gets the coveted seat.

Recently, Mendelsohn Aviv screened The Truman Show – the 1998 Jim Carrey movie in which an insurance salesman/adjuster discovers his entire life is actually a TV show – for his popcorn-munching Grade 8 students. The catch was that they had to figure out how the movie related to their studies. (There are similarities to the Book of Job, which they studied last year.)

A lesson from the teacher: "Kasheh b'tironut. Kal b'krav – It's hard in basic training, but [as a result] easy in combat. If you learn the fundamentals now, then later on it will be much easier." (An Israeli citizen, Mendelsohn Aviv – who was born in Chicago to Israeli parents – learned this lesson during a stint of military duty in Israel.)

"For me the most important thing in terms of Jewish education is engagement," Mendelsohn Aviv said. "You want them to come away saying, 'Now I'm ready to continue my Jewish studies,' not to say, 'I've had enough and I'm done.'"

He has always felt connected to Judaism and Jewish studies, but Mendelsohn Aviv said that although he had some excellent teachers when he attended an Orthodox Jewish day school in his native Chicago, he also had some who were "fairly dogmatic and harsh."

His own style is quite different, but he said students still haven't figured out that tests are "not such a big deal" for him. "I wish we could do away with [marking]."

That is not an issue at the Florence Melton Adult Mini-School, where he teaches an advanced course on Food and Jewish Culture, a subject that relates to his doctoral thesis, titled Knowing as Eating: Enriching Jewish Education Through Food as an Anti-Cartesian Dialogic Paradigm, Pedagogical Method and Subject Matter.

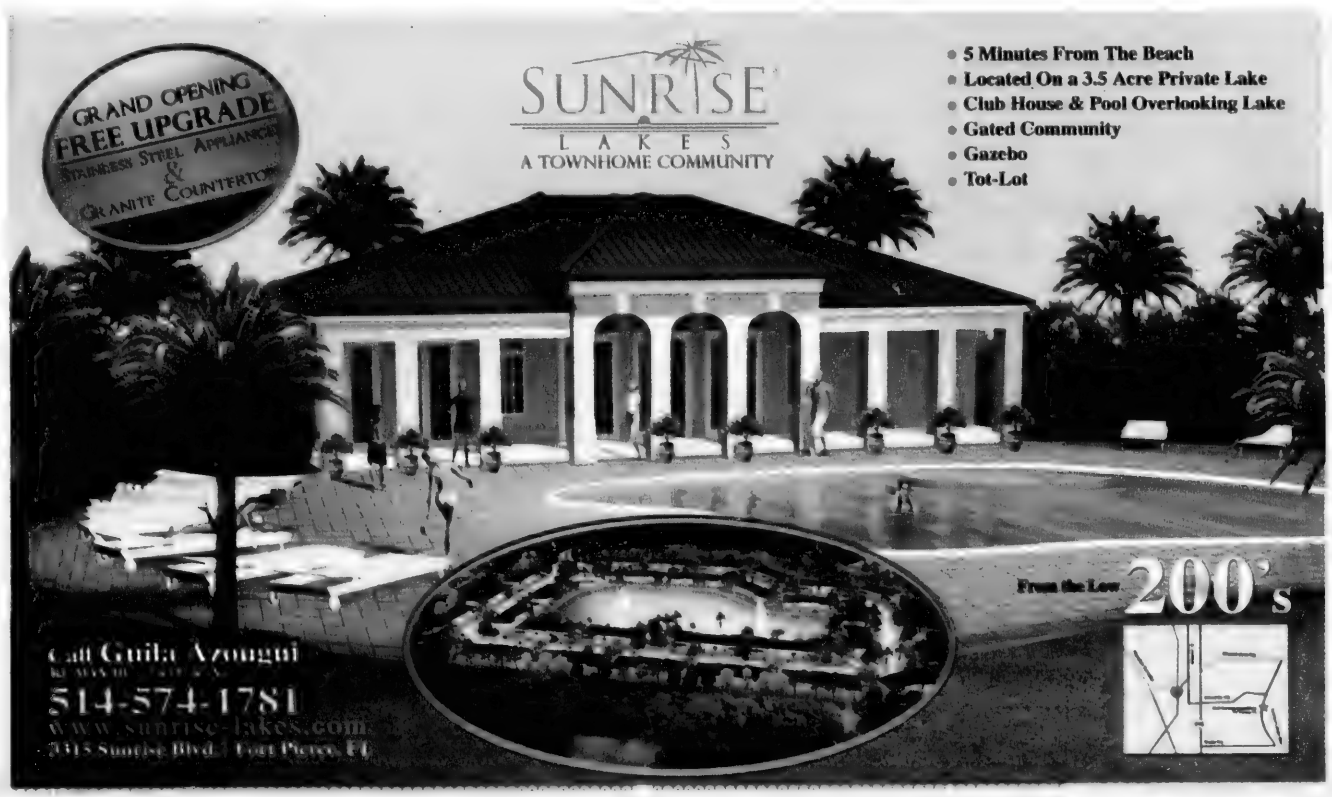
Dan Mendelsohn Aviv

He is also an online adjunct professor of Jewish education at Philadelphia's Gratz College and teaches at UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's Midrasha L'Morim.

At Bialik – where he has been on staff since 2003, following a one-year stint at United Synagogue Day School – Mendelsohn Aviv has co-written a four-unit curriculum on Jewish history.

Among his initiatives was a competition similar in format to the popular television show Canadian Idol. Four classes were involved in the project, for which students had to write poems in the style of a particular section of the Book of Job.

"I want [their studies] to be the little mint on the pillow that's a nice flavour [so they'll say], 'Now I want to do more.'"



A little skepticism is definitely in order

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In a Sept. 17 New York Times book review of The Greatest Story Ever Sold: The Decline and Fall of Truth from 9/11 to Katrina, by Frank Rich, reviewer Ian Buruma discussed the media's failure to ask tough questions about the war in Iraq. He posed the rhetorical question, "How can one explain the temporary paralysis of skepticism?"

He wrote that the job of newspaper editors "is to publish what they believe to be true, based on evidence and good judgment."

Buruma pointed out that the New York Times is among the papers that failed to be properly skeptical. So perhaps it's not surprising that the next day, the Times editorial, "A Road Test for the Palestinians," said: "After six months of crippling sanctions, Hamas' leaders are trying to figure out the very minimum they need to say – and the even less they plan to do – to end their isolation and salvage their government. Skepticism is more than warranted."

But the Times promptly abandoned any skepticism. It argued that even though "Hamas still refuses to say the words necessary to unlock international aid: that it will renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist," the United States should try to find a path back to "peace talks."

The Times' inconsistency was remarkable. Its argument, in effect, is that if Hamas and Fatah join a national unity government based on the international conditions mentioned above, then the international community can provide aid to the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority and resume negotiations. But Hamas won't accept the international conditions, so, therefore, the international community should look for ways to resume aid and promote peace talks.

While such faulty logic would receive a failing grade in a university term paper, it passes for progressive thinking in the New York Times.

A similar failure of logic is found in the Sept. 12 Globe and Mail front-page article "Palestinian unity deal aims to end aid boycott" by Mark MacKinnon.

The headline appropriately applies the journalistic test of skepticism in describing Hamas' motivation for forming a unity government with Fatah: it needs to find money for some 160,000 striking PA employees who have gone several months without pay.

However, in describing the deal between Fatah and Hamas, MacKinnon writes: "It seems to allow the new government to implicitly recognize Israel – a key condition set by the international community for the restoration of aid – while the Hamas movement maintains its anti-Israel position."

The international community requires the unambiguous or "explicit" recognition of Israel – "implicit" recognition is not acceptable. While MacKinnon notes that Hamas "would not change its 1988 founding Charter, which calls for the destruction of the Jewish state," he fails to even ask what "implicit" recognition means and how Hamas could reconcile its declared aim of destroying Israel with "implicitly" recognizing the Jewish state.

On Sept. 14, the CBC's Terry Milewski reported from Israel about the debate over prisoner exchanges, and in particular the ordeal of Smadar Haran Kaiser. She is the sole remaining member of a family that was destroyed by terrorist Samir Kuntar in 1979, whom Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah is demanding be included in any exchange for the two Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah in July.

Previously, this column criticized the CBC's Nahlah Ayed's Sept. 4 sympathetic portrait of Kuntar's family. Whether intentionally or not, Milewski's longer report compensates for Ayed's unbalanced piece by providing extensive Israeli perspective, including the brutal nature of Kuntar's murderous acts.

Milewski's report, nonetheless, is not uncritical. He shows that while successive Israeli leaders have always said they would never negotiate the release of citizens held by terrorists, there have been prisoner exchanges over the years.

His story shows how much Israelis value life – how far they are willing to go to get one or two (or sometimes just the remains) of kidnapped soldiers or MIA's back in exchange for hundreds of Arab prisoners, including terrorists.

Milewski interviews Arie Lova Eliav, a former Israeli negotiator, who explains that the Arabs know "the Israelis are ready to pay a very high price, not only for live prisoners, but for bodies. It's according to Jewish law, and it's sacred."

Most remarkably, Milewski notes that Smadar Kaiser "doesn't pretend to like the idea of freeing Kuntar, but she is not campaigning to keep him in jail. She is not looking for revenge."

Enrolment declines in Jewish school programs

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — School administrators are attributing an enrolment decline in Winnipeg's Jewish school programs this year largely to Russian Israeli families who transferred their children to the general school system.

The half-day free Hebrew immersion program at Margaret Park Elementary School's, a public school in north Winnipeg (most young Jewish families live in south Winnipeg) lost 20 students from last year – most of them Russian Israeli children – pushing the program's enrolment below 90.

"We had a number of Russian families from Israel who sent their kids here last year because of our Hebrew program," said principal Cynthia Dutton.

"Some of them weren't interested in celebrating the Jewish holidays and traditions and were more concerned with having their children learn English. In some cases, the students moved to other schools in the area. Other families moved out of the area."

She noted that this year's kindergarten class has 10 students.

The Gray Academy of Jewish Education Winnipeg's main Jewish private school, with students in kindergarten through Grade 12 is also feeling the loss of Russian Israeli students and the decline in Argentine immigration.

Part of a campaign to bolster Winnipeg's Jewish community, Argentine newcomers boosted Gray Academy's enrolment to 650 two years ago. The wave of immigration has largely ended over the past two years, and while the number of Israeli immigrants, mainly of Russian origin, has been substantial, their attachment to the Jewish community appears not to be as strong as that of the Argentines.

Thus, last year, Gray Academy's enrolment dropped back to 620 students, and this year it stands at 585.

On the positive side, head of school Rory Paul said Gray Academy has had to add a fourth junior kindergarten class to handle demand.

"We budgeted for 590 students for this year, and we should reach that number by the end of September," Paul said. "We expect we have some more students enrolling in junior kindergarten and we know some new immigrant families are expected."

Paul said the enrolment decline is partly due to the slowdown in Argentine immigration.

He added that antipathy to Jewish education may also be why some immigrant students didn't return to the school, but he noted that cost is also a factor for some. While the school waives tuition for first-year immigrant children, their parents are expected to pay a minimum $750 per child in their second year in the school. Full tuition is $6,325 per student. but the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education has a sliding tuition scale based on family income and the number of students per family enrolled in the school.

Paul also noted that some families, including one prominent Winnipeg family with five children, have left the city for business opportunities elsewhere.

As well, he said that Gray Academy traditionally loses a substantial number of students at the junior high and high school levels to other private schools and, at the high school level in particular, to the University of Winnipeg Collegiate program. Paul said this year's Grade 12 class, whose numbers vary from year to year, has 27 students, compared to 34 last year.

Winnipeg's two other Jewish day school programs are showing slight increases in enrolment this year. The Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Elementary School, a public school in south Winnipeg, has 181 students this year, up from 172 last year, likely due to more Russian immigrants signing up. There are 24 children in its kindergarten, about the same as last year.

"We have several more [English as a second language] students this year," said principal Ira Udow.

Meanwhile, Ohr HaTorah, the modern Orthodox elementary and junior high day school that holds classes at Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg, has an enrolment of more than 60 this year, compared to 45 last fall.

One reason for this year's higher enrolment was the Lubavitch movement's decision to close its elementary school in north Winnipeg and place its younger children in Ohr HaTorah.

"We opened our school in 1988 after the school that was operating out of the Herzlia closed," said Rabbi Avraham Altein, Chabad's senior rabbi in Winnipeg. "Now our children are mostly grown up and the younger Chabad families live in south Winnipeg. We thought we would try enrolling the children in Ohr HaTorah this year. If it doesn't work out, we can always re-open our school next year. Our purpose in opening our school wasn't to compete with the other school programs. We had a need."

Oscar winner Matlin headlines campaign launch

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — She is an Academy-Award winning actress, a published author, an activist and a sought-after public speaker, yet she says her proudest accomplishment is being the mother of four wonderful children.

Marlee Matlin, who is deaf, gave the keynote address at this year's annual campaign kickoff for the Jewish Federation of Ottawa. The event was held Sept. 19 at the Canadian Museum of Civilization. Matlin delivered her address in sign language, with her interpreter by her side.

Matlin said she lost her hearing as the result of a childhood illness. "After 1½ years of hearing and speaking, I was diagnosed as profoundly deaf and there was no cure. My parents were devastated. My parents grieved and they felt guilty, very guilty," she said.

Marlee Matlin

Although professionals recommended that her parents place Matlin in a residential school, her parents chose to keep her at home and send her to regular, neighbourhood schools.

"My parents never treated me as different. They never treated me as special," she said.

She learned to make her way in the world with the love and support of her family and because, she said, "I had chutzpah!"

Fortunately for Matlin, she grew up in Chicago, where she was able to attend Temple B'nai Shalom – "not your ordinary temple" – which served both the deaf and hearing communities.

In an interview, Matlin described her happy childhood experiences at the temple, where she was part of the "signing choir," attended Sunday school and had private lessons with the rabbi, who knew sign language, to prepare for her bat mitzvah.

As an aspiring actress, Matlin was fortunate to meet Henry Winkler of TV's Happy Days, who became her friend and mentor.

"He may have been the Fonz to the rest of the world, but to me Henry Winkler is the coolest Jew and the biggest mensch in the world," she said. "Fortunately for me, Henry came from a family that had even more chutzpah than mine… Henry said 'Marlee, sweetheart, you can be whatever you want to be. Just follow your dreams'… Nine years later, I was standing on his front doorstep with the Academy Award in my hand."

She added: "I have worked as an actress for 20 years. I have an Oscar, a Golden Globe and four Emmy nominations to prove it. I am not boasting, but I am proud."

Matlin said she's equally proud of her work helping federations with fundraising. She has visited many cities over the past three years to help with UJA fundraising. "Throughout my travels on behalf of [federations], I have seen the important work [they] do providing both immediate help and long-term solutions," she said.

Ottawa's annual fundraising campaign supports more than 29 local beneficiary agencies, as well as Jewish organizations in Israel and around the world.

War has shaken Israel's political system: academic

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The recent Israeli/Hezbollah war has shaken the Israeli political system to its roots for the second time in less than a year.

The first time was last Nov. 11 when then-prime minister Ariel Sharon announced that he was quitting the right-wing Likud party to form Kadima, a centre party, and then he called an election, Reuven Hazan, of Hebrew University of Jerusalem's political science department, said.

"Kadima broke the mould," said Hazan, who was a speaker at the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem Winnipeg chapter's mini-conference, The Best of Hebrew U, on Sept. 16 and 17.

The conference featured six Hebrew U professors speaking on a range of topics, from biblical interpretation and archeology to aging, social conditions in Israel and domestic politics. It was co-sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre of Winnipeg.

Hazan said the problem the war created for Kadima is that its principal electoral plank, unilateral withdrawal, has become null and void. "Just five months after the election, polls show that [Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert is in trouble. If an election were held now, Kadima would lose. Olmert's best hope would be for a very low voter turnout."

He noted that recent polls show that 71 per cent of Israelis support the new United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) force in southern Lebanon and 51 per cent would support an international force to separate Israelis and Palestinians.

"It's too soon to know where events are headed," Hazan said. "There is the impression that the government has lost its way and that anything is possible. We can only hope that the result of this latest upheaval will be a more stable political system that will restore public confidence in politicians and the system."

Hazan said that Kadima became the first Israeli centrist party to ever win an election as the Israeli public had coalesced in the centre after 40 years of right- and left-wing battles for power. All other centrist parties failed to survive because there has been no middle ground until now, he said.

Going back to the beginning of the state, Hazan noted that for the first 20 years, the political debate was dominated by economic and social issues with the Labor party, under the leadership of David Ben-Gurion, and his successor, Levi Eshkol, winning every election. Although Labor never won an outright majority, the party was always far ahead of the next closest competitor, Menachem Begin's Herut, which later became Likud.

After the Six Day War in 1967, Israeli domestic political debate shifted from social and economic concerns to security and what to do with the new acquired territories. The electorate became polarized between the right wing, which favoured keeping and settling all of the new territories, and the left wing, which favoured a land-for-peace deal with the Palestinians. Elections since 1967 had been a neck-and neck-contest between the left and the right.

Hazan described Sharon as a pragmatic realist who helped form Likud in 1973 because it suited his purposes. Sharon came to realize within the past couple of years that for demographic reasons, Israel could not hold onto Gaza and all the West Bank, Hazan said. It was also clear that his Likud party wouldn't support his disengagement policies, so he formed his own party.

"Polls just before the election call last November indicated that Likud would win 38 seats and Labor 23," Hazan said. "As soon as Sharon left the party, the Likud vote collapsed. Kadima became the heavy favourite and the only question was who would finish second."

At one point, he said, Kadima was projected to win 44 seats. That many seats hadn't been won by any one party in 25 years.

Kadima showed itself to be more than Sharon's personal party after he suffered an incapacitating stroke early in the election campaign.

Kadima's support softened somewhat under the leadership of Olmert, Sharon's successor, but still finished with 38 seats. While the Labor vote held, Likud's support collapsed.

In analyzing where Kadima's voters came from, Hazan noted that half were former Likud voters who had moved to the centre. A third came from the collapsing secular party, Shinui, while one- quarter were former Labor voters. The Kadima voters came equally from all parts of society.

According to a recent survey by the Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace, 49 per cent of Israelis now identify themselves as centrist, with 27 per cent on the right and 24 per cent on the left, Hazan said.

"A majority of Israelis are in favour of negotiations with the Palestinians, would recognize an independent Palestinian state and want to sever all relations with the Palestinians."

Hebrew U's travelling road show

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Nearly 150 people recently had a learning experience that usually requires a transcontinental flight and a considerable investment of time and money.

Participants in the fourth annual "Hebrew You!" had access to the talents of four professors from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, without having to leave home. A one-evening event, the travelling road show was brought to Ottawa by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and was co-chaired by Myrna Barwin and Sonja Kesten.

Yair Zakovitch, the Father Takeji Otsuki Professor of Biblical Studies at Hebrew U and a leading scholar in the literary analysis of the Bible, delivered the keynote address, "The Peace of Jerusalem in Biblical Prophecy," as participants ate dinner.

Zakovitch said that "every prophet has his own style. Every prophet is a poet." Expressing frustration with English translations used by participants, he quipped, "All translations are bad by definition. You cannot translate poetry. The next time I come to Ottawa, please make sure you have all learned Hebrew."

After dinner, each of the three other professors delivered two lectures apiece.

Howard Litwin, the founding head of the Israel Gerontological Data Centre at Hebrew U, outlined six different theories for aging successfully in the first of his two lectures.

Nava Panitz-Cohen, of Hebrew U's Institute of Archeology, spoke on the topics "Shoes and Ships and Sealing Wax, Cabbages and Kings: Archeology in the Quest of Ancient Individuals" and "Can Archeology 'Save' King David and King Solomon."

Eitan Barak of Hebrew U's department of international relations delivered lectures on "Weapons of Mass Destruction: Myths vs. Realities" and "From Alienation to Involvement: Israel's Arms Control Policy."

News was 'like a bombshell'

Eric Weiner tracked down Irwin Glasberg, a lawyer with the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General in Toronto, who is the son of Eddie, another of the four surviving brothers, who died in 2004. The two exchanged photographs that confirmed that they were indeed descendants of the same family.

"It was like a bombshell," Irwin Glasberg said. "I called my uncle Simon and told him I had some good news – that two of his sisters had survived the war [one died in 1970] and Hilda was living in Israel. He was incredulous, and he started to cry."

Irwin said his uncle felt a sense of urgency to get to Israel to see his sister as soon as he could, a wish that came true last week.

As the various members of the family began to communicate, they slowly pieced together the history of their family, which had been torn apart by the war.

When the Nazis invaded their hometown of Chernowitz, Romania, the Glasberg family of nine splintered. Hilda, who was 10 at the time, escaped with her older sister Bertha to Uzbekistan. Hilda married Elye Itshok Shlick and they had two children, Zali and Hertha. In 1998, Hilda immigrated to Israel, following her son Zali's family, who have been living there since 1991. Hilda's daughter, Hertha, currently resides in Minnesota.

Simon Glasberg, his parents, Henia and Benzion, and three brothers, Mark, Karol and Eddie, found refuge in a Romanian basement. A third sister, Pepi, vanished and her fate is unknown, although the family presumes she was a victim of the Nazis.

After the war ended, Simon and Mark moved to Israel. Together, they fought in the War of Independence before moving to Canada to join their parents and brothers. Henia and Benzion lived into their 90s and died in the 1980s. Eddie died in 2004. Mark lives in Montreal but was not well enough to travel to Israel for the reunion. Mark's son, Irving, lives in Be'er Sheva, Israel, about a 30-minute drive from Shlick.

Glasberg and Shlick spent Rosh Hashanah together in Israel. Shlick wants to come to Canada to spend time with her newly found relatives, including her brother Mark, and to pay respects at the graves of her parents and brothers Karol and Eddie, whom she never saw again after their childhood separation.

Irwin Glasberg plans to go to Israel this winter and meet some of the 13 new relatives he has discovered (at least the ones there – one first cousin is still in Estonia and another is in Minnesota).

While he said the whole experience left him feeling "wonderful. I was on Cloud 9," it was bittersweet as well. "I was disappointed that because it took so long, my father died and couldn't be part of it."

Yad Vashem director Avner Shalev hopes the reunion will encourage Jews everywhere to search the database for the names of relatives and to submit pages of testimony for those who have been lost. Since the database went online, Yad Vashem spokesperson Estee Yaari said there was at least one other reunion of two sisters in 2005 – Klara Blaier, then 81, and Hannah Katz, who had not seen each other for 61 years.

"During the holidays, while everyone is spending time together," Yaari said, "we're encouraging children and grandchildren to talk to their grandparents and search the database to ensure that their losses are recorded and if not, to submit pages of testimony in memory of their loved ones killed in the Holocaust."

Employment fair planned for Oct. 5 at Asper JCC

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The third annual Employment Networking event will be held at the Asper Jewish Community Campus on Oct. 5.

It is "a great way for both new and established Winnipeggers to meet employers from a broad variety of fields, in a relaxed, welcoming setting," says Cliff Huot, the manager of the Jewish Job Exchange.

So far, 27 employers and employment agencies have committed to coming out and setting up tables at the Employment Networking event. Huot says his aim is to have at least 30.

RBC (Royal Bank of Canada), the City of Winnipeg, Reaching E-Quality, Houston Group, Bison Transport, YES (Youth Employment Services) and Great West Life will be at the networking event. Companies specializing in consulting, engineering, information technology and accounting will be there, along with staffing companies, employment services and training providers. Self-employment guidance will be offered.

Huot, who has been managing the Jewish Job Exchange since July 6, plans to make some changes at the exchange this fall, including bringing in new staff and introducing new employment programs to help every age and stage of job seekers.

One of the exchange's new programs will teach essential skills. "It will be a great program for new immigrants, including the honing of English-language understanding. Without such programs, this can be a big stumbling block for people looking for work," says Huot.

"When you are given a form to fill out to apply for a job, or on a job, you have to be able to have that understanding. Without that basic skill, it can be very challenging out there.

"Many of the Russian Israelis who have recently immigrated here have been through a process like this before [when they came from Russia to Israel]. They may not have had the local language skills at that time, and again now, but they have found entry-level, manual jobs that get bread on the table," he says.

"The problem is that most of these newcomers are educated and skilled, and after six months or a year, they get bored in entry-level work and want to find work in their trained professions… Pursuing work in their fields… often requires some time not working, and having to go back to school to upgrade their skills."

So far, about 35 people are registered for the networking event – both new immigrants, including those with Russian-Israeli backgrounds, and Canadian and Winnipeg-born candidates. Many people sign up at the last minute, or just show up. "Last year, we had at least 150 candidates attend. Hopefully, we'll have even more this year," Huot says.

"The whole idea is to get people out to talk to and meet one another, with the hope that it will lead to an interview."

For more information about the Employment Networking event, call 204-480-7559 or e-mail chuot@aspercampus.mb.ca.

פרסי האקדמיה לסרטים

אביבה אפשטיין הוא סרטו החדש של שמי זרחין, האיש שמאחורי לילֶדָה המפורסם של לפני מספר שנים. אביבה (מלי לוי, שוכתה בפרס שחקנית השנה) היא אשה טבריינית שעובדת במטבח של מלון, שבנוסף לטיפול בילדיה המתבגרים, בעלה המובטל, אמָה המטורפת ואחותה המתוסכלת, כותבת סיפורים מופלאים שקשורים בחוויותיה האישיות. מסיע לה בשיפור כתיבתה סופר ואיש אקדמיה תל אביבי שכבר שנים רבות איננו מסוגל לכתוב. ואז הוא מציע לאביבה להוציא ספר מסיפוריה תחת שמו המפורסם תמורת תשלום נאות. אביבה, שנמצאת במצוקה כספית, מתלבטת האם לוותר על שמה, או להתעקש בסיכון שאיש לא יפרסם את סיפוריה. לא אשתף אתכם בסוד החלטתה, אך רק אומר שזהו סרט רגיש, מצחיק ונגע ללב, חכם ונעים מאוד לצפייה. שמי זרחין זכה בפרס במאי השנה, תסריטאי השנה, והסרט התחלק במקום הראשון עם "אדמה משוגעת". סרט מעורר כבוד ושווה צפייה. שמתה בסולם קורן.

אאפ אשאת הוא סירטו החדש של דרור שאול, שרק לפני כשבוע התקבל בהתלהבות רבה בפסטיבל הסרטים הבינלאומי של טורונטו. זהו סיפורו האוטוביוגרפי של הבמאי, שנולד וגדל בקיבוץ כיסופים שבנגב, על ילדותו בצל מחלת הנפש של אימו, ויחסותו מאביו שהתאבד כשהיה בגיל צעיר. הסרט, שהוא קופרודוקציה ישראלית-צרפתית, עשוי ברמה אירופאית מרשימה. הסרט אינו מחמיא לקיבוץ ולחבריו, ומציגם כקבוצה של אנשים אטומים, שחסרים רגישות מינימאלית למצבם האנוש של האם ושל בנה. בניגוד ל"אביבה אהובתי" שמועלה בהצלחה רבה מזה מספר חודשים, "אדמה משוגעת" יגיע לאקרנים רק בדצמבר. שמתה בסולם קורן.

שנה קשה הסתיימה, ועיני כולנו נשואות לשנה שתהיה יותר רכה, עם יותר חסד ורחמים. זמן חשבון הנפש יימשך הרבה אחרי הימים הנוראים, ומדינה שלמה תצטרך לתת דין וחשבון על התנהלות הצבא והמנהיגות בזמן מלחמת לבנון השניה. אם מיטיבים לזה את המעקה הקשה של החשדות נגד נשיא המדינה ונגד שר המשפטים לשעבר חיים רימון-הרבה נחת אין לתושבי הארץ ולישראלים באשר הם שם.

הכביש הישראלי

חייתי לפני כשבועיים בארץ למשך שבוע, נהגתי בהזדמנות יתר בצד ימין של הכביש, חששתי לחיי, ראיתי איך מתנהגים הישראלים על הכביש ואמרתי לעצמי עם שנוהג כך, באוסף משמעת מינימאלית, בפראות ופזיזות כל כך בוטות, בלי לאותת ובלי לתת סימן כלשהו על שינוי מסלולים- מה הפלא שהוא מתנהג באותה צורה בצאתו למלחמה, באוסף דאגה לבטחון חייליו הצעירים והמבוגרים, באוסף כבוד לחיי אדם. הלא הכל בא מאותו מקום-ולוותל כללי בזולת, אלא אם כן הזולת הוא במקרה אחיך או חברך מתצבא. כל השאר-על הראשי. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Nazi-looted art back in Germany

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The battle by the estate of the late Montreal art dealer Max Stern to wrest a valuable Nazi-looted painting from an elderly German aristocrat living in Rhode Island has taken a bizarre twist with the revelation that she spirited the artwork out of the United States to Germany, where it was originally bought.

The aristocrat wants a Cologne court to decide who the lawful owner is and whether she would be owed compensation if she's forced to return the work.

Montreal lawyer Robert Vineberg, an executor of the Stern estate, said he hopes to pre-empt her gambit by obtaining a Rhode Island court declaration that the painting belongs to the estate.

He said it appears that Maria-Louise Bissonnette, 82, believes she will get a more sympathetic hearing in Germany than in the United States. He added, however, that he has "no idea" if that would be the case, or even if a German court will hear the case.

Vineberg maintains the work was "acquired improperly" by the Nazis in the 1930s, and that Bissonnette should have voluntarily handed over the 19th-century oil painting by Franz Xavier Winterhalter, a popular German portraitist, when the estate first contacted her more than 1½ years ago. Titled Girl from the Sabiner Mountains, it depicts a slumbering young woman in peasant costume.

Bissonnette is the former Baroness Von Morsey Pickard, whose late husband is believed to have been originally from Quebec. If she still does not relinquish the work, Vineberg said the next step is to try to get a German court to ratify the hoped-for Rhode Island decision, which would permit the estate to seize the painting – if it can be found.

Vineberg said he's almost certain of where the painting is now. The estate is retaining German lawyer and art historian Willi Korte, a specialist in the restitution of looted art for more than 20 years, who has traced it.

He said Korte has also confirmed that Bissonnette's stepfather, the physician Karl Wilharm, who bought the painting at a forced sale for a price well below its value in 1937, was a high-ranking member of the Nazi party and was investigated for war crimes, but never convicted. Bissonnette, who has lived in Providence for many years, inherited the painting from him.

Vineberg said he does not know if Bissonnette broke the law by sending the painting out of the country while it was the subject of legal negotiations, "but at the very least it is morally offensive to take the property out of the country and try to get another court to say it is yours."

It also may have broken an agreement that the painting remain at the auction house where she had consigned it for sale until the dispute was settled out of court.

Stern, who owned the Dominion Gallery for four decades until his death in 1987, is considered one of Canada's foremost art dealers and patrons. He and his late wife Iris had no children and left their estate, which included a huge art collection, to Concordia and McGill universities and Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which have created a foundation in his name.

Concordia launched an international effort in March 2005, headed by cultural property specialist Clarence Epstein, to track down and recover the more than 400 artworks that Stern is said to have had to liquidate from the Dusseldorf gallery he inherited from his father in 1934. Stern sold off his holdings between 1935 and 1937 after the Nazi government ordered him to do so.

In March, Epstein announced that the estate would launch legal proceedings "in the upcoming weeks" against the person in possession of the Winterhalter painting, whom he did not name, after more than a year of negotiations had failed. In April, after the proceedings had begun, Bissonnette's lawyer informed the estate that the painting was in Germany, Epstein said.

Epstein learned of the painting's whereabouts when it was put up for sale in January 2005 on eBay through a Cranston, R.I., auction house, Estates Unlimited. The estate immediately wrote the auction house's owner, Steven Fusco, and informed him of the painting's provenance. Vineberg said Fusco "agreed not to do anything."

The estate's lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Rhode Island, also names Estates Unlimited.

Although the painting apparently left the United States in April, the news only came to light in a Sept. 10 front-page story in the Boston Globe.

Bissonnette's position, according to her lawyer John Weltman of Boston, is that she is the painting's legitimate owner because Stern was adequately paid for it. She will only sell it to the Stern foundation for what she considers the fair-market value of $150,000 (all figures US). Fusco said last March that he believed the painting would sell for between $50,000 and $75,000.

Vineberg confirmed that the foundation offered Bissonnette, who reportedly suffers from breast cancer and is of modest means despite her hereditary title, a "relatively small sum" as a goodwill gesture, but he could not confirm that it was $15,000, as reported by the Globe.

The paper reported that Weltman, who is Jewish and has represented Jewish families seeking to recover art lost during the Holocaust, said he did not counsel Bissonnette to send the painting to Germany and only knew about the move after the fact. He disputes that there was any agreement preventing her from doing so.

"There's no question it was a forced sale, and it has never been her intention to keep that work of art from the Max Stern foundation," Weltman is quoted as saying. "She simply wants a court to determine to whom the work belongs, and if she has to return it, the issue is how much she's entitled to be paid."

Vineberg said the estate's position is that Stern sold the painting under duress, and in "most jurisdictions, a forced sale is the same as stolen art" therefore Bissonnette is owed nothing. "Her title to it is no better than her stepfather's was," Vineberg said. Moreover, Stern did not even get to keep the bargain price for the painting because he had to flee Nazi oppression for England in 1937. Vineberg acknowledged that this has not yet been proven in court.

Epstein, however, said that the documentary evidence is indisputable. Meticulous catalogues were kept by the Lempertz auction house in Cologne, which handled the 1937 sale of about 225 works and is still in business. Records show the painting was sold to the baroness's stepfather for $3,600, although Stern probably received much less. Epstein believes Stern netted "about two to five cents on the dollar." The Winterhalter is listed as confiscated by the Art Loss Registry in London, Epstein noted.

The Holocaust Claims Processing Office, a New York state agency that assists in the recovery of lost or confiscated art, conducted the negotiations between the estate and Bissonnette and her lawyer.

The office was shocked by Weltman's news that the painting was gone. "Your client's actions… reflect bad faith and are unprecedented in our experience," wrote Sherri North Cohen, a lawyer for the office.

The Winterhalter is one of about 13 Stern holdings that Epstein has located to date and he has traced more than 40 others. Stern is thought to have sold off more than 400 works between 1935 and 1937.

McGill, Weizmann join forces on cancer research

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Michel Tremblay and Ari Elson are both fascinated by the obscure world of protein tyrosine phosphates (PTPs), a diverse group of enzymes involved in the regulation of cell activity.

PTPs are thought to play an integral role in the "signalling" among cells necessary for growth. When something goes wrong in that normal process, cancer may develop.

Despite their possible importance in the understanding of cancer, PTPs have received little scientific study.

Tremblay, director of the McGill Cancer Centre, and Elson, chair of the Life Science Board at Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science, are in the forefront of that research.

With their labs half a world apart, they have done their best to keep abreast of each other's work and exchange information. Now they look forward to a more formalized collaboration after the first annual joint conference of McGill and Weizmann cancer researchers was held in Montreal this month.

Elson was one of 12 Weizmann cancer researchers who participated in the three-day conference whose topic was Molecular Mechanisms of Tumorigenesis.

Tremblay and Yoram Groner, head of Weizmann's M.D. Moross Institute for Cancer Research, announced the creation of a partnership between their two institutions, which have a total of 150 researchers.

At the conference, more than 30 presentations were made on the latest insights gained in basic and clinical research, covering such topics as how cancer spreads, communication between cells, cell death and therapeutic advances. Five of the researchers also participated in an evening geared to the public.

"This conference with the Weizmann Institute marks the start of a relationship with one of the world's great research centres," Tremblay said. "Through our association with the Weizmann Institute, McGill will not only mount ambitious joint research projects and have access to an important technological platform in both countries, it will also be able to recruit high-level researchers."

The partnership is intended to strengthen and expand the scientific exchanges already existing between the two institutions.

"Many of our research programs overlap and complement each other in all fields of cancer research," Tremblay said.

Groner said that nearly 40 per cent of Weizmann's life-sciences research projects are cancer-related and involve multiple disciplines. "Our scientists are attacking the problem from different directions, exploring the mechanisms of malignancy at its various stages. Their aims include understanding the basic biological processes involved in cancer, devising improved diagnostic techniques and developing targeted therapies."

But true progress can only be achieved by "transcending geographical boundaries," he said. Groner commented that it is a sign of Israel's resilience that a small country that was in the midst of war only a few weeks earlier continues to carry on making a contribution to humanity.

Weizmann already has joint programs with such leading research institutions as the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Centre and the National Institutes of Health in the United States. Three McGill researchers are currently engaged in post-doctoral studies at Weizmann.

This formal collaboration has its roots in a visit to Israel by 50 Canadian academics, from a variety of disciplines, organized by the Israeli embassy in January 2005. Tremblay was one of four McGill professors on the trip.

After touring the Weizmann Institute, Tremblay realized the advantages of deepening the ties that existed between individual scientists from both institutions.

Tremblay said the inaugural conference shows a great deal of goodwill on both sides "like every new marriage. The challenge now is to see how we can maintain that."

Denis Therien, McGill vice-principal of research and international relations, said that "in an era when one in three people will be diagnosed with cancer during their lifetime, collaborations such as these are imperative to optimize efforts in accelerating cancer-therapy developments.

"Only through interdisciplinary teamwork and international co-operation will breakthrough discoveries and innovations be made," he added.

The McGill centre was founded in 1978 to co-ordinate cancer research in the university's different departments and affiliated hospitals. About 20 researchers work full time at the centre, while another 50 are directly associated. There is an academic chair at Weizmann named for its founding director, Dr. Phil Gold.

The Moross Institute, founded in 1998, co-ordinates more than 50 interdisciplinary research groups studying cancer-related topics at Weizmann and facilitates bringing discoveries to clinical trials.

PTPs are a diverse group – over 100 members of this family have been identified on the human genome – and not much is known about them. Recent observations have shown that PTPs can function as tumour-suppressor genes, while mutations in certain others may cause tumours to form.

Elson, a molecular geneticist, has identified the PTP epsilon as a potential target for breast-cancer therapy.

Tremblay, a biochemist, has found PTPs act as both triggers and targets of the pathways by which DNA damage occurs.

Among the other Weizmann participants was Eli Canaani, whose discoveries led to the development of Gleevac, a drug now used in the treatment of chronic myelogenous leukemia. Renowned McGill cancer researcher, biochemist Nahum Sonenberg, who was recently named a fellow of the Royal Society of Canada, is a Weizmann graduate and was one of the conference's organizers.

The inaugural conference, held under the auspices of Weizmann Science Canada, was made possible with funding from McGill, the Israeli consulate, the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, and several Canadian pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies.

Israeli hip-hop group rocks London

By NOAH FARBER
Special to The CJN

LONDON, Ont. — Chart-topping Israeli hip-hop group Hadag Nachash ended the Canadian leg of their North American tour by tearing it up in front of 500 University of Western Ontario students at Club Phoenix in London, Ont.

After learning that Hadag Nachash would be performing in Toronto and Montreal on Sept. 10 and 11, Western Hillel invited the band to London to perform on the following night.

The seven members of Hadag Nachash – rapper Sha'anan Streett, DJ and rapper Guy Mar, keyboardist Dudush Klemes, drummer Moshe "Atraf" Asraf, bassist Yaya Cohen Aharonov, guitarist Nir Geva, singer, saxophonist and flautist Shlomi Alon, and trombonist Yair Selotzki – took to the stage for what Western Hillel president Tali Bogler described as one of Western's biggest Jewish social events ever.

"It's the best way to start the year," Bogler said.

"It was great to see a gathering of so many Jewish students all looking to see a great concert," said fourth-year business student Boris Poley.

Other organizers and sponsors of the gig included Israel on Campus, AEPi, National Jewish Campus Life and the Jewish National Fund.

Hadag Nachash, which is currently touring to promote their fourth album Be'ezrat Ha'Jam, uses hip hop as a forum to discuss Israeli political and cultural issues.

Their new No. 1 hit song, Hine Ani Ba (Here I Come), for example, is about the deepening cultural struggle in Israel between Jerusalem, the ancient city that symbolizes Israel's heritage, and the country's largest burg, Tel Aviv, which is known for its nightlife.

The band, which infuses rap, hip hop, funk, jazz, electronic, and rock with Middle Eastern modes, is one of Israel's most popular acts, and judging by the hundreds of students that came to the concert, they're quickly making a name for themselves in North America.

"We had people come out that usually shy away from Jewish events on campus. It was great to see so many Jews singing and dancing together, having the chance to hang out with the band and just take in the entire experience," Bogler said.

Israeli hip-hop group Hadag Nachash played for University of Western Ontario students.

BRISKET WITH DRIED FRUIT AND POTATOES
Daphna Rabinovitch

2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 onions, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. paprika
1/4 tsp. each ground ginger and coriander
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
1/4 tsp. each turmeric, cinnamon, cayenne and salt pinch pepper
3 1/2 cups chicken stock
1 1/2 cups dry red wine
3 tbsp. honey
2 bay leaves
1 single side brisket (about 4 lb.)
1 cup dried apricots
1/2 cups pitted prunes
2 each baking and sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into chunks

In large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat; cook onions and garlic, stirring often, for 15 minutes or until soft.

Meanwhile, in a bowl, combine paprika, ginger, coriander, cumin, turmeric, cinnamon, cayenne, salt and pepper and stir half into onion mixture. Cook, stirring for 30 seconds. Add stock, wine, honey and bay leaves; bring to boil. Remove from heat and let cool for 10 minutes.

Trim all but a thin layer of fat from brisket. Rub remaining spice mixture over nonfat side. Place in large roasting pan, fat side up. Scatter apricots and prunes around brisket.

Pour stock-wine mixture over brisket. Cover with foil and bake in centre of 325 oven for three hours, basting every 30 minutes.

Place potatoes around meat. Cover and bake, basting every 30 minutes for one to 1 1/2 hours longer or until meat is very tender. Let cool slightly. Cover and refrigerate for up to 24 hours. Remove solid fat from pan. Transfer meat to cutting board; slice thinly against the grain.

Return to pan and spoon juices over meat. Cover and rewarm in oven at 325 for one hour, basting occasionally. Remove bay leaves. Arrange meat on large platter, arranging dried fruit and potatoes alongside meat. Makes eight servings.

Prime Minister Olmert admits to war errors

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert admitted last week that there were failures in the management of the Israel Defence Forces and the home front during the war in Lebanon.

Ehud Olmert

"There were military mistakes during the war and in how to support the civilian population," Olmert said in an interview with Channel 2.

"I always make mistakes, and the ultimate authority lies with me, but the most basic decisions were not mistakes," he added.

"We could have got ourselves into even greater danger and been under fire from longer range missiles," Olmert continued, claiming that hundreds of Hezbollah guerillas had been killed and the organization's front line had been completely destroyed.

"There is no more threat of Hezbollah on northern settlements," he said.

When asked if the appointment of Defense Minister Amir Peretz was one of his mistakes, Olmert snapped, "He is the defence minister – period! He will continue in this role."

Olmert also pointed out that 15 per cent of the Israeli public had even voted for Peretz to be prime minister.

The prime minister also rejected criticism over the continuation of IDF operations despite the ceasefire secured by the United Nations Security Council.

"It was a correct, justified and responsible decision, which was made out of consideration for all the issues involved. It was impossible for us to halt operations at that time, since we would have endangered the soldiers' lives," Olmert said.

"The IDF told me that we had to continue until we reached a point where if Hezbollah continued with its activities, we would not be in an inferior [strategic] position," he said.

Olmert said the argument that Israel had lost the war is incorrect.

"There is great disappointment amongst the public. I understand that, and it needs to be considered," he conceded. "But there is a new situation now, and the international community has also recognized that we had a huge victory against the guerillas."

When asked about efforts to secure the release of the kidnapped soldiers, Olmert said Israel is working "day and night" to free them. "We are using all our force and all methods," he said, refusing to enter into specifics.

Olmert was quizzed about the timing of the war's end, to which he replied, "We received all the information, all the intelligence, and in the end, all the members of the cabinet accepted this decision, and there were a lot of citizens who also agreed with it."
